"THE EARL'S LOVE," A THRILLING CANADIAN STORY BEGINS NEXT WEEK

THE CHICAGO LEDGER

VOL. XXXV. NO. 27. CHICAGO, ILL., SATURDAY, JULY 6, 1907. SINGLE COPIES 5 CENTS.

THE SECRET MARRIAGE;

Or, THE FATE OF A BIGAMIST.

By CONSTANCE BEATRICE WILLARD, author of "Magnolia Blossoms," "Red Roses and Red Love," "A Traitor to Love," etc.

[Copyright by W. D. Boyce Co.]

CHAPTER I.

WHICH WAY DOES HONOR LIE?

"But I love you so madly, my Helen, I cannot think of giving you up."

"Perhaps she loves you just the same as you do me."

"Or you do me? Tell me, dearest, if you do love me."

"How can I, when you are engaged to some one else?"

Helen Croton drew her very tall figure to its full height, and flashed her dazzling eyes at him, beautiful as a poet's dream, a woman to win men's hearts and to make them bleed.

"But, darling, think. We cannot control our loves. It is a matter over which we have no control. My heart went out to you at a bound, the first time I saw you, and I resolved to win you," and Calhoun Fairley's every word was a caress. Calhoun Fairley, the young Southerner, who had received so warm a welcome from the Highland Spring coterie after his two sensational plunges, the first on the track with his Kentucky-bred horses, Sunlight, a magnificent bay, and Pluto, a horse without a white hair in his black coat; and then in Wall street, where in a day he rushed up some hitherto worthless stocks he had held in a Western mine and almost deserted railroad.

All he possessed in the world had been placed on those two horses, the stock and all, and now, ten weeks later, he is many times a millionaire. When he had left his home in the South to come North with his horses, he had tenderly drawn a golden head to his shoulder, whispering:

"Sweet, we must part, alas," and she, Pansy Arlington, had looked at him tenderly, her cousin and lover, and now was pleading with magnificent Helen Croton for her love!

"Listen, is my love nothing to you? I care nothing for my wealth if I cannot have you. You speak of an engagement. There really is none. Pansy Arlington has been brought up with the rest of us, and is more like a sister."

"Did you ever ask her to marry you?" Helen asked, looking out over the shimmering river, and wondering about many things.

"Never," [illegible] replied promptly, although he had felt he had given her reason to think that he loved her by kissing her as he had.

"Have you written her?"

"No. Our family letters are open secrets, and I made the trip to Sydney do for all."

"She would never make any trouble?"

For an instant there was a flash of anger in his heart, for Helen, deeply as she loved him, had no realization of Pansy's sweetness, then he remembered just that, and holding out his hands, whispered:

"There is nothing for you to fear. Come, my darling, come, and let me know that you love me a little."

The girl, almost as tall as he, stood, as graceful as a flower on its stem, but perfect motionless.

"Helen, darling," he pleaded.

Suddenly the dark lashes raised, he saw the glowing eyes open wider, filled with such a love as he had only dreamed of, and then she was in his arms, his lips crushed to hers, which returned his passionate kisses.

Wildly in love as he had been, there was something fascinating about her, this graceful, lovely woman, with her thousand graces, that Calhoun forgot little Southern Pansy, his honor, and begged with all the ardor of his clime for a very early marriage.

"How early?" she asked, again dropping her eyelashes.

"As soon as possible, darling. I feel I have waited a quarter of a century for you."

"Silly," she returned, again giving him a glance from those wonderful eyes, "why, you are no older than that."

"I know it, precious," kissing her red lips, "but that doesn't alter the case that I have waited that long, does it? Say when."

The girl sat perfectly quiet. There in that little arbor in the corner of the yard, with just enough moonlight for him to see her eyes and the beauty of her face, they were free from interruption. Calhoun felt he would have killed any one who intruded then. At last she drew very near to him, clasped her arms, soft, clinging and white, bared to the elbows, about his neck, and whispered:

"I will make it soon, for I am so lonely."

"Your aunt?"

"She is not my aunt. I am only her companion, a paid servant, whom she dresses and feeds, not much else," and the inflection was bitter.

Calhoun gave a start, and something like an oath slipped from between his teeth. He had wooed the wonderfully charming girl, but had paid but little attention to the disagreeable Mrs. Jane Foster, who had passed for her aunt.

"You a paid companion!" he cried. "Why, darling, we cannot be married too soon. Let me have the right to defend you this very night, and your life of drudgery is over."

Again she sat very quiet, her head on his shoulder, tears rolling down her cheeks and falling upon his hands.

"I can't stand this, Helen. You must stop. I love you so, and to see you crying! Child, say something, tell me 'yes.'"

At this frantic appeal, Helen said hurriedly:

"But such a marriage would not be perfectly legal, would it?"

"Why not? We are in the State of New York. No license is required here. We are both of age. Come. Right down there in the village is a clergyman. In half an hour we will be husband and wife, if you will come with me," and he held out his hands.

Slowly she arose, and with quivering lips asked frightenedly:

"Is it all right, Calhoun? I have no one to advise me, nothing to guide me but my love for you."

"As God is my witness, love, it is right, and I will prove to you what real love is by making your unhappy life just a dream, a glorious reality."

Without another word Helen Croton put her hand in his, and he drawing it through his arm led her away, down a rustic path to the house of the clergyman.

Her dress was white, and in the soft, summer breeze, floated about her. Never was a bride lovelier. Suddenly he stopped:

"We no wedding ring!"

"This will do for the present," she replied, drawing a heavy gold ring from her hand. Except that she wore it on her right hand, he would have thought her married when he first met her. "I have had it a long time," she said simply, and he took it as quietly as she offered it. It drew a magnificent diamond from his little finger and tried it on her third hand.

"It's all right and will do for a keeper, until we get some more," he said in a satisfied tone, allowing it to remain there as he again drew her hand through his arm and led her to the rustic porch. Once there he lifted the heavy bronze knocker, he put his hand on her shoulder, and with a smothered feeling:

"Helen, I swear I will love you as long as I live, and you will never regret this step. Swear you love me, and that you are doing this of your own free will."

"I swear to both," she said solemnly, and then he knocked again. A servant girl entered the house, to come out fifteen minutes later, husband and wife, with the blessing of the church upon their heads, young and rich, blessed with health, and yet a sigh rang out so heavy as drowned the service for the dead had just been read over them.

CHAPTER II.

LOVE'S SWEET, MAD DREAM.

All the dread of the future had left them. This bride and groom, as they stood in the spacious reception hall, surrounded by big, his arm about her white-clad figure in a possessive way that showed the difference between the day before. Then and now, but the woman he loved, now she was his wife, looked upon as the most sacred tie on earth.

"Did she miss you, darling?" he asked, between tender kisses.

"No. It is supposed I am not to go to her until she wakes in the morning, and was there on time," and she blushed as she spoke.

The husband kissed her again before asking:

"When are we to announce our marriage to the world?"

Helen looked pensive. "That is just it, when?"

"Why, this morning," he almost shouted. "This beautiful woman, his wife! Why did he care who knew or when?

"If I were not the other girl," Helen said softly, "I would say yes, but as it is, I think that we had better say nothing for a little while."

"Retain me to be alone with you, Calhoun, for a few days," she continued, clinging to him.

"Where?"

"Here, just as we are."

"But, my dear! Think. Some one might see or hear, and that woman who employs you!"

"I can manage. The very mystery of it renders it the more delightful, please."

Calhoun was naturally very straightforward, but under the influence of his wife he could say nothing to oppose her, and when he said gently:

"I see no way to anything you want," he felt more than repaid by her clinging caresses, her loving words, and her prettily caressing ways.

Indeed Calhoun Fairley had never known what love was until his marriage. Like a mighty wave it had swept him away from his natural environment, and he was being borne out to sea, his senses steeped in passion, his very soul on fire.

"And you do love me, you really do?" was his frequent question, answered by words of endearment and kisses so clinging, clinging and tender, that he wondered if he were awake.

"Am I on earth, or is this a Mohammedan heaven, and shall I awake after the unbidding hours?" he asked more than once, and she would reply, burying her face on his breast:

"Your wife and your love, dearest, who loves you more than everything on earth."

At the end of a week, he found himself as much in love as before, and so occupied with his young wife that he did not notice the coolness with which he was received at the office next, but he did see that the little summer bower in which they had made love so much had been torn down.

The owner of the hotel, and his most valued guest, a lady of some fifty years, who came every year, and naturally regulated affairs, were having serious consult together, when Helen Fairley swept past, her white hands full of mail. Perfect peace was on her beautiful face, and it was difficult to connect evil with her, and yet the two sitting there, who had the reputation of the house at stake, shook their heads.

At the same time Calhoun Fairley, from below, with letters in his hands, could be seen looking after her, and his face betrayed them both.

"It must be done," the landlord said decidedly.

"I am so glad you see it as I have," returned his guest.

Calhoun sank into a chair, and opening the first letter read it through, then sprang to his feet.

"Make out my bill, please," he said excitedly. "I must leave immediately, my father is dying," then started to run up stairs.

"Thank the Lord for that blessing!" the landlord whispered to himself, for an instant later and he would have performed his unpleasant task of informing him that his room was needed for some one else.

"I'll wait a little about the others," he mused, for he hated to be at all unpleasant to any one.

For the first time since their marriage, Calhoun went to his wife's room, and rapped lightly on the door. Helen opening it, looked worried.

"Quick, come inside," she said in a low tone.

"No, come to my room, for I must pack while I'm talking," and he was gone.

Without waiting she followed, and as his room was off a side hall, she had no difficulty in reaching him unseen, and found him already packing. Helen, who, as she knew, had not had time to read the letters, or his books, or his clothing, and he was in a hurry, and in time.

A pleasant smile parted Helen's lips as she pushed him gently into a chair, and began to gather up his belongings, saying to her husband:

"Now tell me. You spoke about packing. They have a telegraph office where you are, haven't they?"

"What makes you think so?" he asked, looking at her with adoration in his eyes.

"Several of the women have failed to wear one, and I have asked me if there had been talking to you so much of the time. Rather intimated that they had no chance of catching you, I might as well give you up. That I would do nothing but ruin her reputation, and even worse. Threw his neck, her kisses on his lips.

"You are a darling, believing as you must leave me for a little. By that time I'll arrange it. Will write you when you can rejoin me, or anything you want."

She was sweet about it, he felt that few could be so unselfish under the circumstances, until she had his belongings in order, and then put him from her with a last good-by. Tears were in her dark eyes but she controlled them, and only when he was on board the train which was to separate him from her for a time, as he looked at the lovely scenery, a heaviness of heart fell over him.

"It is gratitude to my sweet darling," he kept whispering to himself.

At last he remembered he had not read the details of the letter summoning him home, and eagerly took them. They were not to be found. Evidently they were packed with the rest of his belongings, and the thought for the time being, was of the woman who bore his name, who was his wife, the light of his existence.

CHAPTER III.

FRAGRANCE OF AN OLD ROMANCE.

When Calhoun Fairley reached the little station, with its second country road, although, instead of having made two fortunes and having won a beautiful bride, he was coming back to his home, overhanging pine and cypress trees still did their best to make it a picture of beauty, and he paused; on the shaky platform were half a score of negroes, white lives, here, and though human, resembled a tribe of half-trained monkeys, and the same soft, half-musical negro dialect fell on his ear. He came to his ears, and as his lungs breathed in the air of his own country, he wondered that he had ever had the courage to leave it, forgetting entirely the many long years of misery and toil, and his determination to conquer it. He had, and was, oh, so rich, with his money and wife; no, the wife first.

The fragrance floated through his mind almost instantly, for scarcely had his foot touched the platform when a pair of arms were thrown about his neck, and he was kissed him, and he felt himself instinctively returning the caress of a woman, and one who was supposed to be his future wife.

"Helen was right, not to come here, for at such a time, but what am I to do with poor little Pansy, and how can I break the news to her? Poor child!" and he had returned her kiss, as he always had, asking, however:

"How's father?"

The soft blue eyes filled with tears, and Pansy sobbed:

"Mighty low, Cal, mighty low."

Calhoun sat in the chair and felt himself thinking:

"And that puts my announcement of my marriage a little further off, I can't stand it."

Being so deeply in love, he had not been quite honest with Helen with relation to Pansy. While he had never thought much about the matter, his father had always been received upon the question. It was one of those peculiar ideas that are so common in the South. In order to save his property from the hammer, owing to losses during the war, Major Fairley had married for money, only to find out afterwards that he loved a girl with whom he grew up. With that intimate chivalry that was his, the major made out what he could, but had been, or was, her state of feeling, but buried his love in his heart, and when his wife died married the friend of the merriest at her wedding.

The women were friends, and the woman he loved were warm friends, and very fond indeed, were those of their children. When Pansy was about four and Calhoun eleven or twelve, the mother of the former died, and Pansy fell to Mrs. Fairley's care. Her husband, who was a first cousin of the major, married, and went abroad with his second wife, and Pansy grew to regard Calhoun as her elder brother as well as Calhoun's and both received a good deal of his attention, for he lost his wife before he was twenty-five, and his wife's child he had said her every attention, nobly trying to make up to her the mother she had his love, and succeeded so well that she never knew the bitterness of unhappiness which was buried his heart grew still more tender for Pansy, and then it was that he began to think of making her a wife, and marry the dainty little thing.

At that time, with a careless boy, and thinking really more of his school and horses than of girls, save beauty-crowned, and the consultation with which he met his own sweetheart, then his wild ride to meet her on the fleet, and he found himself placed in the unpleasant situation of being engaged to one woman, engaged to another, and his father's wishes and dearest desire on the point of being utterly ignored, and the sick man's father was mercifully unconscious of the fact.

"Yes, the dear, he is mighty sick," Pansy continued, as Calhoun's side as the same old landau that had borne his father to church to meet his bride.

"Where's Thomas asked, while he wondered what Helen was doing at that moment.

"He's been running down for some time, but none of us seemed to see it, for he's not in my nature that he wasn't well, and I hoped you'd come, but you knew that."

"I have been so occupied I really have not been out to attend every friend," he said, ashamed to confess that her letters had ceased to interest him.

"I know, I know, and honestly, then she said almost reproachfully:

"You're different somehow, Cal."

"How different?" he said, coloring. Full well he knew why he felt so strangely indifferent to her talk, for it was Helen. Lips that had kissed Helen's, that had whispered to Helen's ear, that had spoken words of endearment to Helen.

"You don't seem to care," she said gravely, laying a plump little hand on his and speaking earnestly. "It's mighty nice, and I'm glad you're home, and but it is to change you this way I'd rather you'd stayed away. I've been praying hard for one can always live on the old plantation."

The young man felt an unjustified anger spring up and he looked at her almost pityingly.

"Oh, Pansy, Pansy! What do you know of living? Of human life, even, my child. You must know something of the great outside world, where men and women are so different. Just as this little girl, you have never been to a real ball, nor seen the theatre, nor anything, and I'm afraid the rest of your life waking up," and he felt that he had solved the riddle, his and Helen would take little Pansy with them and what a fine time they would give her.

"I suppose the people you have been seeing have changed, Cal," she said, looking sadly, "for yours are so different," and she stroked the sleeve of his perfectly fitting coat, "and you're not the Cal I was talkie in New York.

"You don't say do, but none will be finer than yours when I take you to see the men and women there."

He was trying to break the matter gently, so was surprised to see the color flame in her face, and then a look of sadness shadow her eyes, then she replied, a little sharply for her:

"We are cruel to talk of anything except the major when he's so sick. Do you know, he is sometimes out of his head, for this morning he called me Clorinda, that was mamma's name, and told me how he loved me. Then he asked, wiping away a few tears. If he died now while the roses are buying their second bloom, if we'd pick white roses and fill the grave with them, so that the casket would be covered by it, until they did not look real. Poor dear!"

"Your mother was buried that way," Calhoun said softly; "they were her favorite flowers."

"Was auntie?" she asked, using the name she had always called her.

"No, mother did not care for anything sentimental. She was buried in the family vault. Father could not bear the thought then, he has always been too much of an outdoor man."

Pansy twisted her little fingers, hesitated a moment, then asked timidly:

"If I tell you something I think, will you promise not to be angry?"

"I couldn't be angry with you, Pansy, dear," he said. Angry with that little sixteen-year-old girl, and yet, quarrels he would become if this father died?

"Then I will tell you," she said during this illness of his. He has called me by mamma's name often, and has talked about, and when you were little you were his little girl, and how he has been with him catch you up in his arms and whisper, 'My little white rose.'"

"I don't remember his doing that," Pansy whispered, deeply touched by this old-time romance.

Calhoun felt such a wave of loneliness and longing for his wife that he hardly knew where he was, and could not work out speaking of her, and so he said quickly:

"Pansy, I want to tell you about you first of all," but before he could continue, a negro boy came around a curve in the road, mounted on a horse, foaming with hard riding.

"It's Ben, oh, the major must be worse!" Pansy broke forth, while for the instant Calhoun felt everything but the fact that onward there in the old home his father—the father to whom he owed—was dying, and it did not need the negro's message to send them toward the house as fast as the two beautifully matched bays could travel.

CHAPTER IV.

THE IMPOSSIBLE HAPPENS.

All outside faded when Calhoun grasped his father's hand and looked into the aristocratic face with the dead seal upon it.

"Dad!" the young man cried, dropping to his knees beside the bed, "you're not coming sooner!"

The dying eyes opened, and the smile for which he was famous, the one inherited by his son, spread from the eyes down to the mouth, and he said in a very clear voice:

"Cal!" Such an expression of contentment came over his face that Calhoun realized that he was glad to see his son to his father, and what he owed to this kindly, courteous gentleman. The next moment he remembered that he had made unfortunately mysterious marriage, and realized that he had not thought of his father at all, but this good father, and sweet, little Pansy.

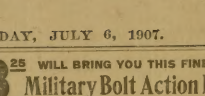
"Son, it is so good to have you home again," Major Fairley said tenderly, and Calhoun knew that Pansy had told Pansy had done.

"I love you a mighty lot here," he continued, "and did not want you to get wounded away from us by the wiles of the outside world. This is your home, son, where you and I, and your granddaddy before you, have been born, and in cemetery there all our kin folks are. Pansy's mother is there. Your mother, son, would like to be there, she wished to be in the gloomy vault, and so she's there, just as wished."

The words came at intervals, and the voice was very faint, but Calhoun heard every word and felt the heart of fire from was being drawn from his veins. In explanation of his words, and that this grief over his father, no condemnation of the course which he had taken with regard to Helen, combined with extreme fatigue, which his long and unbroken journey had engendered, superinduced a certain kind of unconsciousness, and he moved like one in a dream.

As the old man sunk lower and lower,

$8.25 WILL BRING YOU THIS FINE HOPKINS & ALLEN
Military Bolt Action Repeating Rifle
22 Caliber
16 Shots



YOU WILL MAKE NO MISTAKE IN BUYING THIS RIFLE. It's the HOPKINS & ALLEN JUNIOR REPEATER—recognized everywhere as the handsomest, best handling, quickest and strongest shooting 22 caliber repeating rifle made in America at the price. Shoots 22 caliber short, long and long rifle cartridges without change of carrier. Shoots 16-22 caliber short and long rifle cartridges. The action works like lightning. You can work it from either side of the gun. Just rest the fore-finger of your left hand against the trigger; the appearance of the Gun is something to take pride in.

THE STOCK is of beautiful selected American Walnut, handsomely finished, like Mahogany. BARREL is of fine high power rifle steel, rifled with our new patented system which gives long range and accuracy. SIGHTS are open rear and front sights (peep sights can be supplied on No Seal action made for a repeating rifle only). The rifle is packed in a strong box, 36 inches long, barrel 24 inches—takes down in two parts and can be packed in a trunk. Materials, Manufacture and Assembling are of Highest Grade Throughout and the Rifle is Warranted to Stand Severest Satisfaction—a Remarkable Bargain at the Price.

Call at your Dealer's or Write us Today. WE WILL SEND THIS RIFLE DIRECT TO YOU FOR $8.25—AND GUARANTEE SAFE DELIVERY AND SATISFACTION—IF YOU CANNOT FIND IT AT NEARBY DEALER.

IF YOU ARE INTERESTED IN ANY KIND OF A FIREARM, WRITE FOR OUR BEAUTIFUL "GUIDE AND CATALOG" FOR 1907. FREE

Gives more points on guns than a dozen ordinary books. Gives best prices and most complete line.

THE HOPKINS & ALLEN ARMS CO., Dept. 66, Norwich, Conn., U. S. A.
European Office—8 City Road, Finsbury Square, London.
Largest Manufacturers of High-Grade, Popular-Priced Firearms in the World.

THE DEATH-KEY MYSTERY;

OR, A GREAT DETECTIVE'S RUSE. BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

[Copyright by W. D. Boyce Co.]

Begun in No. 20, May 18. Subscriptions can begin with that issue, or back copies can be obtained from news stands, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER XI.

As soon as Jansen Moore and Keeneyes had left Whitcock Farm, their relationship was changed.

Moore no longer bore himself with the air of Keeneyes, and Keeneyes surrendered his part as Jansen Moore.

They walked rapidly toward town.

When Fenceville came in sight, Jansen Moore, still reflecting upon his recent interview with Sophs Le Brune, sighed deeply and said, "Well, we have been here a night and almost two days without being any nearer the solution of the mystery than before, and, speaking strictly for myself," he added bitterly, "without being any wiser than I was before I knew Sophs."

Also for yourself, strictly," remarked Keeneyes, "when you say we are no nearer the solution, do not forget that I am one. If I am concerned, that is the same to me—I speak of the mystery—as an old glove, turned wrong side out and worn upon my hand gone to my very heart."

"What have you discovered?"

"That you need not require, for you have discovered it yourself, I know. But I have inferred, my dear fellow, I have inferred."

"What have you inferred?"

"Come, come," answers pleasantly, "I may not tell you that until you are ready to impart your own conclusions, for this is a case of skill, you will remember."

"Or mere chance," murmured Moore.

"Pardon me," said Keeneyes, "but are not ready?"

"Look here, Mr. Zellers," cried Moore impatiently, "do you mean to tell me I know who killed Sophs Le Brune, the vicious horse?"

Keeneyes laughed, but said nothing.

"You can't mean that Ivan Rey you keep tramping on?" cried Moore, with some expression of horror, "for neither of us have seen it."

"We have seen that it is gone," returned Keeneyes.

Their hotel came in sight at the head of the main street. Moore broke out, "the fact is I am so wretched I can't be interested in this case. I am in a desperate situation. I have rabbled Sophs's mother into thinking me you, and Sophs despises me for it."

"I left you alone with her," remarked Keeneyes, "in order to give you a chance to right yourself."

"Then you knew. But she won't be righted. At least, there is only one condition. She finally weakened enough to give me a note to Sophs, which, of course, you know, sent out to kill—"

"Dear me!" Keeneyes objected, "are you a hero?"

"If you care to be proved," said Moore grimly.

"And what is the text of the note?"

"I am to go to Sophs's guardian, J. J. James, and tell him of my deception and my shame. Then I am to return and report here."

"Fortunately you have not done much," smiled Keeneyes; "your usual good luck, Moore. Well, will you do it?"

"Of course I will do it. After the way you have antagonized him to me, I dare not refuse. But, I tell you, I hate him, he will try to get me from his law office. Still I'll go. I owe it to do whatever Sophs wants me to do."

Miss Sophs seems to possess a marvelous power over you," remarked Keeneyes. "Let us go to our room and discuss that phase of the matter."

They reached the hall above, upon which their doors opened. Keeneyes said impatient joy, "Hello! Somebody has been intruding into our room; somebody has evidently been looking for something, eh?"

Moore stared, then objected, "The door is closed just as we left it."

"But, my dear friend, observe the mat before the door."

"I see no tracks on it."

"Precisely! Nonsense! What put tracks into your head. But you observe then it is not exactly parallel to the crack at the bottom of the door?"

"Well?"

"It was when we left it," said Keeneyes. "Whenever I leave my room, I always note some detail that will enable me to determine whether or not it has been opened in my absence. I tell you that that mat has been moved by some hurried foot."

"I imagine," Moore smiled, "that the housemaid moved the mat to sweep under it."

"And I imagine," Keeneyes smiled, "that you know as little—judging from that surprised expression you do not have—of detectives. Let us go in."

They unlocked the door with the key he had obtained from the hotel clerk and they entered.

"At any rate," said Moore, contentiously, "the clerk had the room key, so how could any one have—"

"There's a note pinned on the pillow," said Keeneyes, triumphantly. "Now, will you still scan and contend? It bears a superscription."

Upon the folded paper was printed in large letters:

"TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN."

"Well," said Keeneyes, "it doesn't concern me, so I will go to work." He opened his valise and took out the manuscript of his autobiography. He opened his fountain pen.

"If you're not going to read it," said Moore—

"Of course not," Keeneyes interrupted. "I am not interested in it. It relates to you, without doubt."

Jansen Moore without further hesitation opened the letter and read:

"If that man Moore is found in or about Fenceville after the hour of 12, p. m., he will be found later very much the worse for wear."

Jansen Moore frowned at the message, and read it several times.

"The author of that," remarked Keeneyes, "has a vein of dry humor. I should judge."

"I should like to dampen it," muttered Moore fiercely. "Mr. Zellers, do you suppose J. J. James has the bottom of this?"

"Since you ask my opinion,—yes; I believe J. J. James has determined to drive you from Fenceville, because he does not want it investigated. Thanks to my clever notes in your name, he regards you as a dangerous man; he little knows you! Yes, I think he is behind that note; but it would perhaps be very difficult to prove it. I think he had you bound hand and foot last night in the law threats in his office, worse—a sound drubbing, I think I read between the lines."

"Yet that is the man," groaned Jansen Moore, "to whom I must go with a confession of my deception to his ward's mother!"

"The same individual, my friend. You'd best think well of it."

"I shall not," said Sophs—best of all in the world. She has asked me to do this; I'll do it; but J. J. James 'wear me as he may!'"

CHAPTER XII.

As soon as Sophs Le Brune and her mother had left Fenceville on the way, about half-past twelve—the young lady called for Jansen Moore.

Half an hour later, the coachman, who conducted the two ladies to mile of "Head," drove her toward Fenceville.

At about a quarter of two, she knocked upon the mahogany door of J. J. James' law office.

"Come in," said J. J. James, and Sophs went in.

The young lady had always stood a little in awe of her guardian. She respected him greatly, to such a degree, in fact, that she had never ventured to treat him as an ordinary individual. In fact, J. J. James had never treated her as an ordinary individual. He was grave and dignified even with his ward, and Sophs, the spirited girl, had never seemed to have discovered that he was only a man.

On the present occasion, his demeanor was more than usually severe, because, although it was now of age and therefore no longer his ward, still he felt upon Sophs the weight of the mantle of authority just removed, because it had been there so long and he had worn it so heavily.

After preternaturally solemn greetings and inquiries as to the expected health, comment upon the need of rain, Sophs began:

"Mr. James, of course you know that I—that we—my mother and I—that we have employed a detective to investigate the causes of Uncle Bolliver's death."

"I have noticed it," said J. J. James with awful solemnity.

But Sophs came to speak of that. You know I—you—we—

"I remember quite distinctly," said J. J. James. "That was on the last day of my late lamented ward's majority, for the investigation greatly disturbed me when you were greatly displeased because I could not have your interests protected by trying to learn something that happened years ago, when, at the time it happened, everything was done that could be done. I have up the perplexed state of affairs."

"Yes, sir," said Sophs timidly.

There was silence, then J. J. James said, "Well?"

"Well, Mr. James, we have employed a detective now—we can't be satisfied to do nothing about Uncle Bolliver, and I—I—but I don't want you to be displeased with me about it. I don't want you to think we have acted against your judgment."

"But you have acted against my judgment."

"But I hope you won't be angry about it."

"I shall not be angry at you, Miss Sophs," said her fierce guardian, pitying her frightened and fluttering appeal. "Don't you worry. Let your detective go ahead and do his worse—his best. He will not annoy me. I am pretty safe in predicting. But I observe, Miss Sophs, that your motives are generous. But the facts are these: your guardian was killed four years ago. Phil Deedum was imprisoned and tried for the crime and acquitted. The only thing that can be accomplished now by an investigation is to bring all that to public memory again, distress his wife, bring sorrow to his home—"

"But suppose we find he is innocent," his wife," cried Sophs, her eyes flashing. "That woman—Uncle Bolliver's wife—she has no right to be happy, if she knew or knows anything about the murder of her first husband—"

"Well, Miss Sophs," said the lawyer, flushing deeply, "Somebody is coming up the stairs. Step into the adjoining room, please, and wait; for really I would like to have you finish your extraordinary remarks."

Sophs Le Brune, still glowing with feeling, stepped to a partition-door, saying, "But I shall be able in this little place to hear everything that passes between you and your client."

"Jostling from the lagging footsteps," said J. J. James, listening, "I think it is a man who will be here but a moment; if the business proves private, I will take him below. Make yourself at home in this little den."

Sophs seated herself at a table which occupied most of the little chamber. It was in reality the end of the larger office, cut off by a thin wood partition which did not reach the ceiling. The light entered from over the partition.

"Aren't you, Sophs hastily, "I hadn't come to what I wanted to tell you. I have reason to think a young man is coming to see you sometime this afternoon, and to tell you—to tell you all—"

"Hush!" said closing the door," said J. J. James, hastily.

Sophs was shut up in the narrow space.

The door leading from the hall to the lawyer's office, now responded to a timid knock.

"Come in, Greene," called J. J. James, similarly to Sophs.

The door opened, and J. J. James started to his feet in surprise and paused in front of him.

The newcomer was Jansen Moore.

"You mistake," said Jansen Moore timidly. "It isn't Greene."

"Oh, indeed!" said J. J. James, acidly.

CHAPTER XIII.

Jansen Moore stood looking at J. J. James, and the evident surprise and perplexity of the latter bewildered the younger man.

"You were not looking for me, Moore observed, "but I take you to mean by surprise than you do me—in the barn-loft for instance, and in the office of my bedroom."

"What do you mean, sir?" asked J. J. James, his face flushing, "that you associate me with your insolent notes and messages, and what are you here now for?"

"I am here, sir," said Moore, boldly, "to tell you that I have misrepresented myself to Mrs. Le Brune, Sophs's mother, and to your eyes, whereas I am simply Jansen Moore."

"Then," said J. J. James, rising, "Mr. James, "Well why did you do so? erroneous, why did you come to me about it? Go and tell Mrs. Le Brune."

Miss Sophs has asked me to come here, and I am come."

"Why does she ask you to come to me? I am her guardian, not yours." J. J. James with careful distinctness, that the listening Sophs might hear.

"She asked me to come to you because she thought I wouldn't do it. But I would do anything for her now at her request. I am here to tell you that I deceived Mrs. Le Brune, and Sophs, and you, Mr. James," said Keeneyes. She had just received a letter from Mrs. Le Brune, which Miss Sophs—so the mother forwarded to me, and under her opinion of me. I was obliged to know what that letter contained, and what Mrs. Le Brune remain under her delusion that I was Keeneyes, and I returned to the letter."

"This law office is no confessional, sir. I am not a priest," said J. J. James, coldly. "You will oblige me by unburdening yourself elsewhere. Then I shall be glad to see you. Good day, sir."

But still we go till I have told you all. That is Miss Sophs's demand of me, sir."

"I solemnly assured her I would tell you all that happened to me and to Keeneyes in Fenceville. I need not tell you of the visit from Mrs. Le Brune and Miss Sophs, for I dare say you know more about that than I do. And the note I received to my pillow warning me to leave town."

"If you have anything of importance to tell me, Mr. Moore," said J. J. James, brusquely, "you have very little time left to do so."

"When your time runs out," said Moore, "you will wish you had heard it. I will tell the most important thing, then, I find that I have Sophs Le Brune most sincerely, and it is my purpose, if such a thing be possible in the course of time, I care not how many years, to make her my wife."

"What impudence is this?" cried J. J. James, "for a—a—a—a stranger, an adventurer, a nameless wanderer—"

"Just such a one I once saw her," cried Jansen Moore—and I have seen her now, Mr. James—the first time, I fell in love with her, but I wasn't sure it was the real love, I came to Fenceville. I was thrown with her almost daily, and half an hour. And I know I love her. This is the most important thing that has happened to me since leaving home. I love Sophs Le Brune, and I shall do all in my power to win her for my wife."

J. J. James was purple with rage. "And she sent you here to tell me this, did she?"

"She sent me here to tell you—"

"Then you can go to her and tell her from me—"

"I say," cried Jansen Moore, "she sent me here to tell you—"

"And I say," shouted J. J. James, "that you can go to her and tell her from me—from me, do you hear—that—"

"Well," said Sophs Le Brune, quietly appearing at the partition door, "what do you

(Continued on page six.)

GETTING READY

Feeding Ahead of Hot Weather.

"Not quite so much meat in springtime," use the cereals, as they heat the blood less." Reasonable advice from an old practitioner.

If one uses some care as to food, the hot weather will be passed comfortably and easy seasons. In fact, a person possessed of a properly balanced set of nerves is very happy and comfortable under most any conditions.

The finest food for building up the nervous system to a perfect condition is Grape-Nuts. They are prescribed by their art, and knowing that nature fills the brain and nerve centers with a soft gray matter which is used up more or less each day and must be replaced, for nervous prostration sets in, and also knowing that the gray matter is made by the combination of albumen and phosphate of potash, they select the parts of the field grains that contain the needed materials, manufacture them into a delicious, ready cooked, food predigested, and of a fascinating flavor.

The use of Grape-Nuts quickly proves that it really does build and strengthen the nervous system in a most certain manner. Hold by dry Grape-Nuts crusts and in daily use in hundreds of thousands of the best families all over the world. "There's a Reason." Read, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Better Notice It?

Little Willie—Say, pa, what is fame?

Pa—Fame, my son, is the thing that makes everybody want to shake hands with a man.

THE DAMNATION OF FATHER FITZGERALD.

BY HELENA BALLARD WHITE.

[Copyright by W. D. Boyce Co.]

Begun in No. 24, Vol. 23. Subscriptions can begin with that issue or back copies can be obtained from news stands, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER V.

A few days following this sad event, the priest found himself in the courtroom with attorneys and witnesses contending for his life.

The case having created so much interest and excitement, the friends of the prisoner with those of the dead girl, together with a throng of curious, filled the room to its utmost capacity. That a priest was on trial for murder was in itself sensational enough to keep a crowd on the outside constantly clamoring for admittance. Strange to say, the dead girl's relatives were conspicuous by their absence, as also her brother was not in the city at this time. It was reported that he was dangerously ill in Mexico.

The spectators were all anxious to get a glimpse of the prisoner, also of the fair young girl whose sad, sweet and beautiful face had attracted so much attention of late.

Each morning the accused and his faithful allianced had entered the courtroom with renewed hope and courage, and each evening found them correspondingly sick and weary with the day's proceedings. Items unlooked for, startling and damning evidence was constantly brought forth against the prisoner, which appeared very little to offer. The circumstances connecting the accused with the crime seemed to weave itself tighter and closer about him. He could only protest his innocence without being able to prove it. The fingers of fate would not yield up their secret.

At last the evidence was in the hands of the jury, and the prisoner, with Mercedes at his side, was led back to his cell to await the result.

These were hours of intense agony to the two that sat together in the cell waiting for their doom to be announced. They had now little hope of an acquittal.

At the sheriff's command, they knew that they had his sympathy and now, as Mercedes looked questioningly into his face, she guessed that he, too, was without hope.

Fabian begged of her not to return to him to listen to the reading of the verdict, but she stubbornly refused to leave his side.

They found the courtroom thronged with spectators, also the corridor. Mercedes sank down beside her lover with her wild eyes fixed upon the jury.

"Gentlemen, have you decided upon a verdict?" asked the court.

"We have," answered the foreman, rising. "We find the defendant guilty of murder in the manner and form charged in the indictment and fix his punishment at death."

A great commotion rose among the spectators, and bailiffs darted through the crowd recommanding silence.

"Found guilty!" fell from Mercedes' pallid lips. "Then I must go to the jury and cried out. "You men would shame satan! You are so wrong—so wrong!"

Fabian endeavored to calm her, but as the judge requested him to stand that he might pronounce sentence, she rushed towards as though in terror.

"Don't—don't do that, Judge, your honor, you sentence an innocent man! God knows he is innocent, the angels know, I know, that he could not do this thing—and to think, judge, that you know. I can tell from your face that—"

The eyes of the judge were moist as he attempted to interrupt her, then as her appeal became more impassioned, he sank heavily back into his chair quite overcome.

"I can do no good," my child, have courage," whispered Fabian. "Your honor, please stay the sentence for a moment," he continued, as he saw the deathlike pallor overspreading the fair young face.

As the sweet head with its auburn tresses fell heavily upon the courtroom amid sobbing, hysterical women and men with bowed heads.

Order was restored, the judged arose and at once pronounced sentence.

"The priest is to hang!" as the priest is to hang!" sang wildly through the corridors of the prison a few moments later, and Mercedes, who had recovered and sat with the matron among sorrowing friends, heard the cry.

"I must nerve myself and go to him," she said, after the first moments of horror and grief had passed. "He needs me now if he ever did. This sentence must be resisted. I shall appeal to God and the Governor, and all humanity, to forbid this—this awful thing. I shall—but I must go to him." She rose and standing, moved to his cell, moaning: "I never dreamed that it could come to this—I never dreamed that it could come to this!"

As she reached the cell, the onlookers turned their heads away when she threw herself into her lover's arms. She, who had been so brave and resolute before, now broke down completely. Nothing but her violent sobbing was heard outside the cell for some moments.

At last the condemned man said:

"Don't take on like this, Mercedes—don't, my dear! You must not give up so."

In vain she endeavored to check her sobs. She had lost all control of herself. She only sobbed on convulsively as though her young heart must surely break. Finally Fabian put his lips to her ear and whispered something which caused her to start up, leave off crying and look questioningly into his face for some seconds. Then a ghastly smile, hysterical, murmured: "Come, let us go to the farther corner, I must know what you mean."

Here in scarcely audible conversation passed between them.

"Do not trouble your young heart so, my dear; I am not going to die," he said. "That is, I believe there is a way out of it."

"Are you only trying to comfort me, or do you mean this, Fabian?"

"I am positively sincere in what I say."

"You look to the Governor to—"

"I look to no man for help. Only to myself and God, and the powers of the psychic law. The latter law is superior to that of man."

"I do not follow you."

"I cannot fully explain now, Mercedes, but believe me, my case may be appealed, the Governor interfere, or something turn up. Believe this then, I beg of you, and my plans. I shall not hang, though; I shall not die, Mercedes. Let that thought comfort you for the present. I have a way out of facing such an end as that. Then, you know, I have powerful still working on the case. We have another month in which to bring the guilty one to justice."

"The guilty one to justice?"

"That is what I said."

"You think, then, that some one really killed her? That she did not do this herself?"

"I told you some weeks ago, Mercedes, that I had my own theory of the whole affair.

"I remember, and you said that you would state it, but you have not told the court know what—"

"I don't think it worth while, so long as it still remains but a theory with little to back my suspicions. The idea was twisted from my coat, not dropped as is stated. But I say no more, except at this point it might have hurt my case more than it could help it, for I have gone so far that it would have interfered with my plans."

"I don't see how. But tell me, have you in mind some one who might have committed this crime?"

"No terrible deed has been committed, Mercedes, that is, no murder."

"What, then, is it? Was it not horrible to tie a poor girl to her bed and burn her to death?"

"That never has been done."

"You talk in riddles, Fabian! Are you sure you are well?" she questioned, anxiously searching his face. "Is your mind not going, dear?"

He smiled indulgently. "It was never clearer. I repeat, however, no one has been killed. It is all the trick of a clever and desperate man, of a revengeful one, a man whom she thinks has wronged her; I am as sure that Edith Burke lives as I am that I do. She is alive and well today, and no doubt rejoicing at the success of her heinous plot."

"Then how do you account for the, the—"

"The woman being burned? Well, the corpse was found in the bed at all events, so she intended it should be. Edith Burke took a drug which would have cured, from some place, and having the girl's confidence, induced her, through an accomplice, perhaps her brother, bound it to the bed with ropes. I realize now from the testimony that was given, that I myself, that she must have had the whole thing arranged. She was ready to set fire to the house the moment I left it, while she herself, disguised, was prepared to fly from the scene."

"Whatever put this in your mind, Fabian? Some one must have suggested the approach because mere impassioned, he sank heavily back into his chair quite overcome.

"I can do no good," my child, have courage," whispered Fabian. "Your honor, please stay the sentence for a moment," he continued, as he saw the deathlike pallor overspreading the fair young face.

As the sweet head with its auburn tresses fell heavily upon the courtroom amid sobbing, hysterical women and men with bowed heads.

Order was restored, the judged arose and at once pronounced sentence.

"The priest is to hang!" as the priest is to hang!" sang wildly through the corridors of the prison a few moments later, and Mercedes, who had recovered and sat with the matron among sorrowing friends, heard the cry.

"I must nerve myself and go to him," she said, after the first moments of horror and grief had passed. "He needs me now if he ever did. This sentence must be resisted. I shall appeal to God and the Governor, and all humanity, to forbid this—this awful thing. I shall—but I must go to him." She rose and standing, moved to his cell, moaning: "I never dreamed that it could come to this—I never dreamed that it could come to this!"

As she reached the cell, the onlookers turned their heads away when she threw herself into her lover's arms. She, who had been so brave and resolute before, now broke down completely. Nothing but her violent sobbing was heard outside the cell for some moments.

At last the condemned man said:

"Don't take on like this, Mercedes—don't, my dear! You must not give up so."

In vain she endeavored to check her sobs. She had lost all control of herself. She only sobbed on convusively as though her young heart must surely break. Finally Fabian put his lips to her ear and whispered something which caused her to start up, leave off crying and look questioningly one saw me leaving there. I now wish to claim that privilege. Of course, when I knew the letter would be discovered and pasted together, I observed that she did not take the pains to tear it to bits, but tore it only twice across so that it would be easily patched together."

"I believe it!" burst from the lips of his listener. "I believe you are right!"

"She bound the corpse to the bed to disabuse the mind of any hint at suicide," he went on. "The crime must be positively fixed upon me. Well, she succeeded admirably, as you know. But I have you, the trump card to play," the priest concluded. "If she is on earth I shall find her!"

"I shall you mean," said Mercedes.

"Together we shall find her!"

"Together? What do you mean, Fabian? You are not going with me, surely?"

"I repeat, Mercedes, that together we shall seek her, unless in the next few weeks I am released upon the case shall have found her hiding place."

"I don't understand."

"I assured you a little while ago, Mercedes, that I should never die by the gallows. With your help I shall leave this prison when the last hope has fled."

"How can you do that, Fabian? It is impossible."

"No, my plans I have thought out carefully—they are feasible. So stay with me, this girl, and I will not leave the city but to look for Edith Burke. I shall need you here to help me when the time comes. Of course, I by no means count upon having everything else fail. It is also a desperate chance that I am taking."

"I shall stay with you, do not fear, Fabian. I shall die with you, if it should come to that."

"Mercedes, what a joy, what a comfort to know that you will be near! I do not know, positively, that mortals go to heaven, but I hope so, for I shall meet you times comes to them. It opened wide its golden gates when I gave me your love. After arrangements have been made and I am free, I shall return to you. Of course, I have placed both you and the detectives who would bring in some glad news. He has failed to find the slightest clue that would lead on to false clues. I said to a reporter but then I did not mean it literally, and I did this to sound his judgment. I was only laughed at, as I supposed. That is what the sensational, yellow journals call 'the devil's wife,' he laughed, but she has never come to the surface as yet. If she had, they, and then, was burned!' I don't know. I answered that I believed the detectives would find out. I could if I had my liberty. After this I concluded to keep my theories to myself, and even to myself, I have kept them secret. They would only have been derided, as was natural, and I myself laughed at in my defense. How easy it is to fool the world if one acts as systematically to work as did this fiendish woman."

"Fabian, indeed you have cheered me beyond measure. I shall not fear, I shall take heart again," said Mercedes, as she rose to go. "I shall have courage to do as you know that I shall do with all my heart. But—but I cannot imagine what you have in mind for a defense."

The condemned man sat for some time after she had apparently left his cell, thought. That he had some confidence in the result of his plans was evident, and to have that confidence which he expressed to her.

CHAPTER VI.

As the next few weeks dragged themselves out, the horror of the one so unjustly doomed did all in their power to have his case appealed to the Supreme Court or a reprieve from the Governor.

When at last Mercedes lost even the courage that had sustained the prisoner throughout his entire confinement, gave way to despair, she had begged to stay with the fate, expecting in the meantime to prove the innocence that by so constantly looked for. He had not full confidence in his own plans for escaping the gallows, and became very despondent as the time drew near for his execution.

Mercedes, by this time, was with wild grief that she could not hide. On the day before the unfortunate man was executed the death cell he watched impatiently for her arrival at the jail. After he had been placed under heavier guard and greater restrictions, he realized that there would be no chance of escape, and doubted while he must now have with her. Every act of his and hers would be watched, every whisper listened to. He spent many hours in earnest prayer, refusing to talk with any one but the fathers or the one whom faith and love had been his comfort.

At last she came and he turned with a welcoming smile.

"Ah, Fabian, it takes courage to smile when there is scarcely a shadow of hope that you will be saved," she said.

"I think, Mercedes, that it is something more than a shadow," he whispered. "And now be on your guard, for we are watched. I am forced to admit that I have come to the end, that my last chance of being saved or set free by human intervening has gone. I do not intend to suffer such a death if there is a way out of it. I hope yet to prove my innocence to the world and be honored among men for your dear sake if not for my own, Mercedes."

"Next Friday is the day set for my execution. My knowledge of the psychic law of suspended animation is all that I look to to save me from the gallows, Mercedes."

"Fabian!" she gasped.

"On Thursday night I shall resort to self-hypnotism as my last chance of escape from so horrible a fate as the law is determined to mete out to me. We had many demonstrations of its power, that is, of the objective mind over the subjective mind, while I was in college, and I know what there is in it. I shall put myself in a trance condition, a state resembling that of death. I shall be as dead to all to save you, my dear. You will understand that I am not. My heart and vital organs I will let myself lose consciousness will be to force out of this state when I hear the words, 'Fabian, awake,' it is Mercedes calling! Fabian awake!' fall from your lips, if I can accomplish it, and I confidently shall be, you can attribute it to heart failure and think me dead. You will give color to the theory of heart failure, I shall in the meantime complete the demonstration I have in mind. Have me borne to the parish house as soon as possible on the morning of the execution, Friday morning. Feed to be left alone with my body. This will be granted you. You have the night and part of midnight, say at one o'clock on Saturday morning or near that hour, then you call to me, 'Fabian, ling at his watch. "It is time to act, Mercedes."

Mercedes took her cue and commenced to weep.

"Oh, I cannot go—I cannot give you up—don't ask it," she sobbed aloud, as both rose. Then she threw herself into his arms and indulged in a wildly hysterical fit of sobbing and moaning.

It was not wholly acting, for the mind of the distressed girl was filled with doubt and perplexity. She feared more than she would have him know, that his plans might fail. There were so many "ifs" to confront even though this remarkable test of mind over matter succeeded.

"Time up," at last called the guard.

Fabian let his arms fall from about her, but she still clung to him sobbing. At last, by sheer force, he released her arms and holding her by them. He started to support her dragging footsteps to the cell door. They had all but reached it when she again turned and threw herself upon him with a renewed fit of sobbing and grief.

The affecting scene caused the tears to stand in the eyes of the men who had schooled themselves into looking stolically upon such partings.

At length he put her from him and motioned the guards to take her away. He, too, was visibly affected, not having full confidence in his plans.

As soon as the door swung to behind her Mercedes swooned in the arms of the guards. What Fabian seeked upon as a commendable piece of acting was a reality, however. Her hope and fear, not as great as his, she suffered as none knew.

At last in a half-dazed condition, she found herself back in the parish house. What hours of agony and suspense she must now endure until the final moment.

Would the gray dawn of Friday morning find him as he had told her he would be led on that day to the scaffold? Her hopes and doubts and fears she would confide to no one, but busied herself with making preparation for the strange event. When all was done, she sat alone, silent, thoughtful and prayerful.

The priests knew how greatly she suffered and tried to say some comforting words, but she only pleaded to be left alone. Sleep had not come to her eyes for many hours, nor had food passed her lips. Her every moment was spent in earnest supplication.

When night closed down previous to the morning set for the execution she was startled by the step of Father O'Brien. Again he had come to console her as best he could. She was in a state of collapse he could readily see. But, she realized this and asked for wine to brace herself. "I must not give up in this hour," she told herself, "else all might be lost. Great Heaven! should anything happen to me, what would be his fate! No one would know—he would be buried alive!" She started up with a shriek.

"What is it?" anxiously questioned the father.

She considered making him her confident —no, that would not do, else Fabian would have advised it. He might not agree that it was right to cheat the gallows, or if so, be a party to the ruse. Nothing remained for her to do but to command her courage and bear her secret alone.

"I am faint—bring me food," she gasped, "and wine—wine to strengthen me. I have need of it, father."

When a tray had been placed before her with a tempting meal, she thought of Fabian in his cell perhaps for his last one. The thought choked her—the food sickened her. She pushed the tray aside and drank down the wine. One, two, three glasses she quickly drained.

With strong persuasion, the good father finally coaxed her to lie down on the couch and try to seek some rest. Riding she stumbled to it and sank heavily down. Sleep at once came upon her. The wine, together with her utter exhaustion, closed her eyelids and dulled her senses.

Covering her with a light robe the father crept stealthily from the room and ordered perfect quiet that her rest might not be disturbed.

When the maid went to rouse her in the morning, she found that she could not and frantically called for help. As she did so she heard excited voices below in the hallway. Some unusual disturbance was going on.

"Come, father," she called to one of the three who stood talking earnestly together. "Mercedes cannot rouse her."

"Why, what does this mean" questioned Father Stephen of the two as he hurried up the stairs.

"It is as I feared, both have poisoned themselves!" sadly answered the one who closely followed.

They entered the room hurriedly and passed to the couch where the young girl lay. And a quite consternation Father O'Brien said:

"It is but a heavy sleep. Stupefied with the wine, perhaps. It is well that she has rested. She will need all her strength on this fatal day."

"Hadn't we better rouse her?"

"A sad awakening for the little girl, but not so sad as though—"

Mercedes opened her eyes and sat up.

"I must have been asleep," she murmured. "What time is it?"

"Eight o'clock."

"Is it Thursday—Friday—what is the day?" she questioned anxiously. "Have I slept long?"

The whole night through. This is morning."

"Friday morning?" she gasped, now springing to her feet.

"Friday—yes—does he still live?"

"Do not—does he still live?"

"No, Mercedes, we have been expecting a reprieve—but it is too late."

"He has been executed?" she shrieked.

The angel of death has miraculously cheated the gallows. Mercedes, let us be thankful that much is the case."

"He is dead!" she cried.

"Found dead this morning, died without a struggle or a moan. We have just come from the prison. Heaven in its mercy spared him so ignominious a death. Be comforted, my child."

"You—you saw, you have looked upon him?" she questioned, wild-eyed.

"Yes, my child, be comforted." And she was. A glad light broke over her face.

"So far, so good," she confided to herself.

"There, I thought you would be sensible and thankful for this deliverance from the hangman, Mercedes," continued Father O'Brien, feelingly. "But let me ask, have you any knowledge as to his possibly poisoning himself?"

"No, father."

"Did he give any hint that he would do so?"

"No, father. But I must go to him," she said, turning away.

"You did not aid him in taking his life?"

"I did not. It must be heart failure."

"The doctors are mystified. They see no signs of poisoning. As you say it must have been heart failure. But I was not aware that he suffered any from that cause."

"He has been complaining of his heart much of late. But I must go to him—I must claim his body."

"Wonderfully composed," she heard one of the fathers whisper.

"I—I cannot, cannot realize that he is dead—I can never," she sighed, "I cannot believe this until my own eyes tell me. You are not deceiving me? He did not die by the gallows?"

The hour should set you to rest on that point, Mercedes. The hour fixed for his death was not before ten o'clock this morning."

"Then let us hurry at once and get his body."

"It is not necessary for you to go along, Mercedes."

"I must—I must! Don't try—don't dare attempt to hinder me," she cried out almost savagely.

"Fabian, awake! Fabian—"

"If the authorities are ready to give up the body your presence is not needed, Mercedes."

"I shall not be denied this privilege. Nothing but force will hold me. I must go immediately and plead for his body," she wildly cried.

"Then take a cup of coffee and we will start."

"Please order it up while I make a hasty toilet, dear father," as a thought of horror crept into her mind. "Do you suppose we will have any trouble in getting possession of his remains?"

"I hope they are through with the inquest."

"They may want to hold an autopsy," ventured one of the priests.

"My Heaven! Oh, my God!" burst from Mercedes' trembling lips. "This must not be—never! Come, let us go—come," she shrieked, and went tearing coatless and hatless down the stairs to the front door.

The priests, fearing that she had lost her reason, that she had become suddenly demented, hurried after her.

Father O'Brien grasped her arm and dragged her back as she was about to pass through the doorway.

She fought like some mad demon. "Let me go—let me go! Do you want them to murder him?" she cried, struggling to break from his hold.

"It is best to humor her," said one of the priests.

"She cannot leave the house in this condition—her mind is breaking," argued Father O'Brien.

"I will do so—I will go stark mad if you hold me here another moment!" said Mercedes, now endeavoring to calm herself. The thought that she might be placed in confinement caused her to use superhuman strength in quieting and nerving herself. Again, the thought of Fabian's lying on a dissecting table stirred her to a frenzy.

She begged me to go to him and claim his body as soon as he was pronounced dead, Father O'Brien. I must keep that promise. Do not try to hinder me. I am fully myself. I am only troubled and frantic because you detain me."

"Humor her, humor her," urged the younger priest, as after helping her on with her wraps she was allowed to pass down the steps with them to the carriage which waited in front.

That drive to the prison Mercedes knew would live in her memory always. How long it seemed—and how the horses dragged their steps. Every little while she would call to the driver: "Drive faster, for the love of Heaven, drive faster!"

The thought of an autopsy had not entered her mind until it was mentioned by the priest. Now she could think of nothing else. It must be prevented. Fabian had not considered this point or he would have mentioned it. She was beside herself with fear. What moments of horror she was enduring during this little journey. They only believed that she frenzied, halfdemented with grief.

At last the prison was reached. Mercedes almost ran to his cell. The warden called for her by name, explaining that the body lay in the death-cell where he now led the way.

The priests pleaded with her not to look upon the dead just at that time, but there was no doing anything with the desperate girl. She would have hers way.

When they had entered the cell where lay the outstretched form covered with a sheet Mercedes hurried forward and snatched off the covering. Eagerly she felt of his cold face and pressed his stiffened hand between her own. Then bending her ear listened if there were any heart-beat.

"It is true! He is dead!" she gasped, half believing. For to look upon the one lying as was most convincing in spite of his assurance that life would not be extinct. She looked anxiously into the faces of the priests.

"Fabian, awake! Fabian—"

"Hush, my child," said Father O'Brien, "you will disturb the dead."

"Disturb the dead—you will disturb the dead!" she shrieked, and then in a frenzy of grief she threw herself upon the body, crying out:

"Fabian, awake! Fabian—"

"If the authorities are ready to give up the body your presence is not needed, Mercedes."

"I shall not be denied this privilege. Nothing but force will hold me. I must go immediately and plead for his body," she wildly cried.

"Then take a cup of coffee and we will start."

"Please order it up while I make a hasty toilet, dear father," as a thought of horror crept into her mind. "Do you suppose we will have any trouble in getting possession of his remains?"

"I hope they are through with the inquest."

"They may want to hold an autopsy," ventured one of the priests.

"My Heaven! Oh, my God!" burst from Mercedes' trembling lips. "This must not be—never! Come, let us go—come," she shrieked, and went tearing coatless and hatless down the stairs to the front door.

The priests, fearing that she had lost her reason, that she had become suddenly demented, hurried after her.

Father O'Brien grasped her arm and dragged her back as she was about to pass through the doorway.

She fought like some mad demon. "Let me go—let me go! Do you want them to murder him?" she cried, struggling to break from his hold.

"It is best to humor her," said one of the priests.

"She cannot leave the house in this condition—her mind is breaking," argued Father O'Brien.

"I will do so—I will go stark mad if you hold me here another moment!" said Mercedes, now endeavoring to calm herself. The thought that she might be placed in confinement caused her to use superhuman strength in quieting and nerving herself. Again, the thought of Fabian's lying on a dissecting table stirred her to a frenzy.

She begged me to go to him and claim crowded about. She must act her part.

"I could not believe it—I could not believe it until I saw it," she continued. "Now I know—Oh, my love, my love, is there nothing that I can do? Have cruel fate—" She checked herself. Her cry, her voice might call him back at the wrong time. She must be guarded. "I must compose myself. Merciful Providence has stayed the hand of the hangman," she concluded, now quietly weeping.

"What do you think caused his death, doctor?" questioned Father O'Brien of the physician who had now come upon the scene. "Can you account for it?"

"We are not exactly agreed," he answered. "Dr. Barrows thinks it may be a case of poisoning, while I am convinced that it is heart failure. Did you know that he was affected in this way?"

"I—I—" stammered Mercedes, "many times of late, since he has been called upon to face this sorrow and disgrace, he has complained of his heart. He—he has been expecting this. I know from what he said. How I understand. But come, let us take him away. Death has given him his liberty. He is free—free—he is yours no longer," she said to the officers.

"I think the body had best not be removed until the arrival of the coroner's physicians."

"But why, why not now? I must take him back—back with me to the parish house where he shall be beautified for burial and laid in sacred ground."

Her keen ear listened to the conversation that ensued between the priests and the physicians as they stepped aside. Hearing the fatal word "autopsy" she sprang quickly into their midst.

"No, don't, don't mutilate the dead!" she cried.

"We must hold the body for a time," urged the young doctor.

"No, no, no, must not touch him! You shall not —you shall not wound with your cruel instruments, your cold, sharp knives, his holy person. I forbid it! I forbid it!" she cried, now pleading in earnest for her lover's life.

"Better take her away," she heard some one say.

She turned to the jailer, the officers, the doctors, now frantic with grief and horror.

"Give him to me—oh, give me over to me! Do not fear that he remains. All I have to ask of you. Such a simple thing to grant a woman whose heart has been so wrung with sorrow. I can endure more no more. What I have suffered, what I have yet to suffer. Heaven only knows! Be merciful, be generous," she moaned, now falling at the feet of the jailer with an agonized, tearful little face. "Give me my love now, now, to take home with me. His cold body is all that I have left. Do not keep it from me. Do not harm, do not mutilate that which is to me so dear and sacred."

Her earnest and impassioned pleading, her beautiful and sorrowful face, was too much for those to whom she appealed.

Finally the jailer stooped and raised her. "Come," he said, "we will see what can be done. We did not think this could mean so much to you."

"Heart disease," that is what killed him without the knife," said one of the doctors as he looked pityingly into the young girl's tear-stained face.

"I know that he has been complaining of it for a long time, but never thought it came out in the jailer.

"I suppose it is just as well to give the body over to her?" spoke one of the officers.

Her pleadings had reached the hearts of all.

Not one but was willing now to do other than as she requested.

Finally the request was granted after some further controversy. Mercedes flew to the supposed corpse, to cover the cold face with the kisses that instinctively she thrust back.

"He is not to be passive—passive! I must not forget," she told herself. "Poor sufferer! she softly said, as the guards stood sway and watched the undertakers, who had been summoned, wrap the body in a black shroud and place it in the wagon waiting in front.

Warmly thanking those who had yielded to her persuasions, Mercedes now followed the priests out of the prison.

A large but undemonstrative crowd had collected outside, having heard of the prisoner's sudden death. Loud were the murmurings of pity for the bereaved girl, who, leaning on the arm of Father O'Brien, now stepped from the prison and entered a carriage.

Not until she saw the undertaker's wagon leading would she consent to be driven away.

"He is mine, he is mine!" she kept saying to her heart as they drove along. "God has given him back to me."

So filled with hope was she, it was hard not to betray her feelings. She kept talking feverishly—and excitedly with the priests.

"You see, it is well that I went along, else they would have insisted upon this horrible murder."

"You make much of such a common occurrending as an autopsy, my dear child," said one of the priests.

"It seems much to me—so much," she said, "and to him. It means—" she checked her words and looked up quickly, studying the face of each, fearful that she might have given some hint of her precious secret.

"I did not know before that his heart was affected," observed Father O'Brien.

She turned on him an eye of suspicion. Had he an inkling of the truth, or did he think it a case of sudden? believe that she was endeavoring to hide the fact of his name.

"It only came upon him after his imprisonment and disgrace, and not we him suffer such a death as the law decided that he should. Assuredly, the hand of the Divine is in this matter to save from so pitiable an end," she added, with great intensity of feeling.

When they had borne the inanimate form to the steps to his own room Mercedes turned to the undertakers kept away until the following morning.

Here was another strong opposition which she was compelled to face, but her pleading importunities finally won the battle as it had before.

Not for more than a few moments at a time was she left alone with the corpse they had carried him.

Many of them to look upon the dead and to learn when the funeral would take place, and now again must the watchful eyes be on her in the matter. The doors until the day of the funeral must be closed against all save the family. This rule would make no exceptions, save the sisters, and the undertakers must not be left until the third day.

There seemed little use struggling with the determined girl, so at last all obstacles that stood in the way of the success of her plans had been thrown aside.

It was a terrible strain upon the young girl, this single-handed fight with fate, and her face showed plainly signs of the struggle through which she was passing. Deep lines had come about the mouth. The eyes looking out from the dark circles were like eyes of one whose brain had already turned.

She hovered over the bed where the body lay, gazing anxiously into the pallid face, now rigid in death. How long this condition would certainly deceive the most skilled physician. He was like one dead. At times she lost all heart, fearing that the worst had really come—that he would never waken from his death-like state.

It was past noon when they reached the house. She had more than twenty long hours to wait before she could know—before she could put this theory of his to the test. What hours of torture they must be! If he had really passed beyond how could she live? Would she have the courage to

(Continued on page seven.)

THE CHICAGO LEDGER

35 YEARS OLD.

Published Every Saturday

—BY—

W. D. BOYCE CO.

All communications should be addressed to

THE CHICAGO LEDGER,
112, 114 DEARBORN ST.,
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single copies come to the Chicago Ledger by mail $1.50 a year, 30 cents for six months, in advance. If not paid in advance, $2.00 a year, $1.00 for six months. Remittances should be made by Bank Draft, Registered Letter, Post-office or Express Money Order, payable to The Chicago Ledger. Subscription price in Canada, $2.50 a year.

ADVERTISING.

Advertising rate $2.00 per Agate Line per insertion. For advertisements in The Chicago Ledger and Saturday Blade.

Entered at the postoffice at Chicago, Illinois, as second-class matter.

THE CHICAGO LEDGER
AND
THE SATURDAY BLADE
Average More Than 750,000
COPIES WEEKLY
PROVED CIRCULATION.

BACK NUMBERS.

Back numbers of the Ledger can be had by addressing this office. Always give the numbers desired, plainly written, accompanied by your full address, and your order will receive prompt attention. Price 5 cents per copy.

BEWARE OF STRANGERS.

The Ledger employs no traveling agents to solicit subscriptions, and every person working in that capacity is a fraud. No person is authorized to take subscriptions for the Ledger unless he or she be well known to be of this office. Persons who are not known to be of this office will never be paid. A liberal reward will be paid for evidence that will enable us to arrest and convict such persons as are now operating in this manner to the detriment of this country, claiming to be agents of the Ledger and thereby defrauding the people. Beware of strangers.

Honesty is the best paid-up policy.

Anything that is almost right is wrong.

A confidence man has very little confidence in other people.

The man who lives in the past carries his breakfast on the wrong end.

You can't dodge the worst by sitting down and hoping for the best.

San Francisco thinks it will be good now for ten years. Why not make the goodness permanent.

Getting elected to the Douma may be classed henceforth as one of the hazardous occupations.

Pennsylvania statesmen should not rest easy when sitting on those graft sofas in the new capitol.

It is getting so that it hardly looks even like the picture of representative government in Russia.

Faith is something that enables a man to close his eyes to his own frailties and imagine his neighbors can't see them.

Postal savings banks in Japan have broken the record for deposits. All highly civilized nations have them.

In case of war San Francisco should keep itself in readiness to spring an earthquake or a general scare on the enemy.

Senator Beveridge's idea that a Chicago girl is the right kind for a real statesman to marry helps to confirm his claim to the title.

Peace for the world may be a dream, as President Seidloff of The Hague conference says, but the prospect of war is a nightmare.

We cannot understand why the Czar dissolved the Douma at this time. Now he cannot take off his bother-plate underwear till summer long.

We trust that the playful school of whales which tagged an ocean liner almost up to the Masonic building, New York, was a vacation school.

Until the question of the two-cent fare is settled the court injunction may as well be prepared to be called out of bed at almost any hour of the night.

Will our young people be obliged to wear a kissometer, so that they will know for certain when to take their sanitary gargle and antiseptic for sweethearts?

Some statistical expert at Washington has discovered that one out of every five women is a bread winner. Possibly some of them would rather win their bread than bake it.

Europe is not unprepared for the annual rush of tourists. In fact, there are men down at the wharves waiting for the boats with sacks in their hands, into which the tourists will be politely invited to throw their money.

The Death-Key Mystery.

(Continued from page three.)

want him to tell me from you, Mr. James?" Her cheeks were crimson, but her head erect.

J. J. James turned upon her fiercely. "That you shall never marry Fred Bell—this—"

"Why, man," suggested Jansen Moore coldly. The sudden appearance of the young lady had iced his ardor. "Well, Miss Le Brune, he has been a fool. We are not quits, now; I did not listen to your letter in the character of another man. But you have listened to my conversation with your guardian without giving me a hint that there was a third person present."

"But you shall never marry Fred Bell—this—" she said. "I was waiting in there till whoever it was would go away, and when I found out it was you, I thought you would just tell about the letter and wouldn't mind my hearing, but I would be glad to know I did hear. And—and I never dreamed you would get angry." Sophia sank upon a chair and hid her face in her arms.

"This is not to be borne!" cried J. J. James. "Sir, leave the room. What does this mean, Moore? Why are you here? I didn't think he would say what! Did you know the fellow had had the impudence to fall in love with me?"

"Yes," said Sophia whisperingly.

"And you dared to come here and tell it?" cried Jansen Moore, "after I had promised to tell the important news that I had for Mr. Moore? Why, that is the greatest thing of all and the only thing I am proud of."

"Please go away," said Sophia, raising her head and looking at Jansen Moore, her interlocked arms.

"There are other things to tell," objected Moore, doubtfully.

"You'll not tell them to me!" shouted J. J. James, "and I don't wanted explosions."

"Please," said Sophia, softly. "Please go, Mr. Moore."

Jansen Moore looked into her luminous blue eyes and thrilled at the appeal. Then he looked at J. J. James and frowned with him after all.

"Miss Sophia, have I redeemed myself?" he persisted.

"Yes—we are as you say, quits."

"And do you think better of me?"

"Yes," said Sophia, decidedly, "I do. But please go, Mr. Moore."

"I go because you ask me to," said Moore. He strode to the door.

"And while you're going," cried J. J. James, fiercely, "you can tell me what's this about Miss Sophia Le Brune will inherit millions from a dead father's estate most defiant eyes at J. J. James.

"Oh, Sophia!" exclaimed Moore, "I can't go!"

Sophia held up her little hand, and Jansen Moore dashed from the room with clenched hands. He thundered down the steps giving himself the opportunity to consider. He had come at Sophia's desire; he had left at her bidding.

Out upon the sidewalk he paused.

He heard a window hastily raised above his head.

He looked up.

Suddenly Sophia's head appeared from the second-story window.

"I was going to call," she called.

Then the face flashed back and the window closed sharply.

Jansen Moore put his hand upon his heart.

"It may not be a hero," he muttered, "but I feel like one!"

CHAPTER XIV.

Keeneyes was waiting for Jansen Moore's return.

Perhaps he expected Moore to come back from the last interview with J. James flushed and chagrined.

Indeed, as he stood before the hotel steps, he was sorry for his young friend. Keeneyes knew J. J. James entertained anything but friendship or good will toward this expert detective in mysteries. J. J. James had, he was sure, come to the city to keep Moore away from the scene of Bolivar Bering's death, and Keeneyes had gone to J. James to confess his duplicity in the affair. Mrs. Le Brune, "Poor Moore!" thought Keeneyes, "I hope he will not be angry with J. James with a whole skin."

Just then Moore came in sight. He appeared to be treading upon air. His face was radiant. Keeneyes stared incredulously.

Moore almost stepped upon Keeneyes without seeing him.

"Any bones broken?" Keeneyes inquired skeptically.

"Mr. Zellers, I'm the happiest man alive," cried Moore.

"Why so?" demanded the detective begrudgingly.

Jansen Moore grinned and said, "I hand you that as a fact. It is for you to make your own inference."

"I have long since made my inference about you," remarked Keeneyes drily. "But draw up one of those chairs and sit down on the sidewalk. I have something to tell you. If you haven't told me, that is."

"Mr. Zellers," murmured Moore, "I don't believe I can follow you. I'm too happy. She said she was proud of me. She said she'd marry me if she wanted to. She looked like an angel. She had a halo of gold all above her lovely face and when she said—"

"Did she say she wanted to?"

"No; what she meant was that if she ever wanted to, she'd do it; she is that independent. I never saw such a girl. I suppose it's because there aren't any others, she has a way, too, of lifting up her chin to make herself seem taller—"

"Did J. J. James agree to the match?" Keeneyes sneered.

"Agree? he was just like a mad bull from start to finish. If she hadn't been there, I suppose there'd have been some physical culture exercise. We couldn't shed blood in her presence. I never saw anybody like her."

"I am glad," said Keeneyes, cruelly, "that she doesn't resemble the lady who was once Miss Nell Atkins. I refer to your former sweetheart, who married, you will recall, her friend's fiance—married your rival, Moore; married the young man—"

"Oh, I don't care whom she married," Moore said indifferently; "Nell Atkins simply couldn't hold a candle to Sophia."

"You thought your heart was broken. I remember," murmured Keeneyes; "well, the girl to whom you were engaged—used to take moonlight strolls with—at least she gloried over you in the fact of being engaged to—and that's a tenderer time even than the engagement—I believe I told you the latest news of her? Fine boy, they say, very fine, ten pounds—"

"I wouldn't care if there were twins," said Moore, smiling. "Now about Sophia—"

"I have something to tell you," said Keeneyes. "If you don't listen, it will be the worse for you. J. J. James has ordered you away from Fenceville before midnight. If he finds you there he intends to fight a duel with you; and especially after this high-handed interview of yours with Miss Sophia at a window, he'll be doubly revengeful. So you ought to get out of here this afternoon."

"I'm not going away," said Moore. "I'll arm myself—"

"Please listen a little longer. It is necessary for us to go to Florida, as there is to be a coroner's inquest of the mystery. And we might just as well go at once and have it over with."

"But I want to stay here."

"Just as you please. Then you give up this mystery?"

"I don't mean to give up Sophia Le Brune!"

"But my dear fellow, we will be gone only a short time. Miss Sophia will be here. She will be all the more pleased to see you after our absence. I cannot think of a better way to get rid of your self than by staying away at large interviews."

"And I could tell her good-by," said Moore, thoughtfully.

"Certainly. That will give you an excuse to see her again, and as her mother thinks you are Keeneyes, she'll be glad to see you. Moreover, you have told her you can be tenderly regretful and when you come back you can be tenderly glad—there's nothing like taking a slice out of an acquaintanceship—it makes the rest of the understanding sweeter. It makes the rest of the cake taste better."

"She will want to know why we are going to Florida."

"You will tell her you wish to interview Phil Deedum and his wife, the former widow of Bolivar Bering. We will be gone a few weeks. In this way, we will hasten the mystery case to a finish, we will protect you from J. J. James with the remainder of a parting, and we will spirit you away from the coroner's inquest—leaving J. J. James. You see? The purchase of your ticket buys a good deal, doesn't it?"

"I don't want to go away," said Moore gloomily.

"I shall go at five o'clock," said Keeneyes. "If you remain here it will be a contempt of court. You will be arrested and thrown into jail."

"But what will we do when we get to Florida?" Moore objected. "Will we go to Mr. and Mrs. Phil Deedum and ask them which one of the old Bolivar Bering's died of a parting, and we will spirit you away from the coroner's inquest—leaving J. J. James. You see? The purchase of your ticket buys a good deal, doesn't it?"

"I don't want to go away," said Moore gloomily.

"I shall go at five o'clock," said Keeneyes. "If you remain here it will be a contempt of court. You will be arrested and thrown into jail."

"But what will we do when we get to Florida?" Moore objected. "Will we go to Mr. and Mrs. Phil Deedum and ask them which one of Keeneyes. "I am very sorry to hear it."

"Yes, it was very sad. It was when her little girl was born. She hasn't had a lucid interval since. Her husband has been obliged to guard her with the closest attention because—well, you see, she tried to kill her own child—"

"Horrible!" exclaimed Jansen Moore, staring blankly at the hurrying men and women as they flitted under the electric lights.

"Yes—she had a cord around its neck soon after it was born—and she has wanted to get at it ever since."

"What design does she labor under?" asked Keeneyes.

"Nobody knows. She never says a word. The doctors don't understand. It is just a stealthy, deathly kind of quiet that's come over her. Her wild eyes show always a spark of resolution, however; and that resolution is to get at her child and take possession of it."

"To kill it?"

"Naturally it is supposed so."

"Her husband isn't afraid of her?"

"He is afraid for her now, I think, but she has never offered any violence to him."

"Wonder why he didn't have her put in an asylum?"

"That's what he ought to have done, as this night's history shows. Now she is at liberty—who knows where? Something terrible is going to happen unless she is overpowered soon."

"Where is the child?"

"The old lady has now it."

"Is it guarded from its mother?"

"I suppose so. She isn't here, anyway, now. Some one must look after her while all this stir is being made."

"Well, then," said Keeneyes, "let us engage a room at the hotel, then you and I will join in the search, too. This concerns the Bolver tragedy, as it is strictly our business."

"It is awfully gruesome," muttered Jansen Moore. "It seems strange that on our first night here we should encounter such a horrible situation."

Keeneyes did not answer. His face and movements indicated that he held himself at highest tension. It was evident that his mind was in the same situation at a hand. They went to a hotel and when a room was secured, Jansen Moore ordered services of a boy who could show him about Everglades.

Although it was late, all the town seemed astir, and there was no difficulty in finding a boy to direct them where Phil Deedum lived.

"Now, boy," said Keeneyes, hastily, "I will pay you in proportion to the way you hurry. Call you Sam. That's a good name for a lad of your age and auburn hair, and we've no time to be picking up nicknames and Christian names. You know where Mr. Phil Deedum lives?"

"Yes, sir."

"Take us there at once."

The boy set off on a trot and Keeneyes and Jansen Moore hurried after him.

As they sped up Main street, there sounded out calls, and all told, indicated the nature of the night's excitement. "Why didn't you bring that lantern?" shouted a voice. "Did Jake take the boat?" called another. "Rubber boots to Little Pocket Swamp!" shouted a third.

At last the boy stopped before a three two-story frame set back in a yard in which grew dense shrubbery.

"This here's the place," said the boy.

"Very good, Sam. Now, where would we be apt to find that old black nurse that takes care of Phil Deedum's baby?"

"She stays in the end of the house—that there's her light at the window."

"Very good. You wait here at the gate till we come back."

Keeneyes walked briskly up the front path, which branched before it reached the front of the house. There were two front doors, and the light came from the door set back from the long balcony. Keeneyes, always followed by Jansen Moore, took the turning away from the main door and went toward the light.

They had reached the steps when a man suddenly crossed their path. "Good morning," said the man.

"Good morning," said Keeneyes. "Are you Mr. Deedum? Mr. Phil Deedum?"

"I am. Have you heard anything? Have they found her?" asked the man eagerly. The night was full upon him. It showed a handsome man of little more than twenty-five, who, however, had been sadly aged by misfortune. Already his hair was heavily streaked with gray.

Keeneyes looked curiously at the man whom he believed to be the murderer of old Bolver Bering. He was prepared to find a cold, cruel secret here—a shifting, uneasy eye, a hand, if not cruel mouth.

He found instead the open fine face that indicated reserve, perhaps secrecy; but there was no self-written confession of the villain.

"I am a stranger to Everglades," Keeneyes answered quickly. "My name is Zellers: this is my friend Moore. We just came in on the train. When we heard of your wife's disappearance, we decided to offer our help. I have had some experience in dealing with the mentally unbalanced, and my friend Moore is an investigator of rare ability."

"Thank you," said Phil Deedum, doubtfully. "Everybody is looking for a trace of her."

"When did you last see her, Mr. Deedum?"

"It was about six o'clock. I was obliged to leave the house for some several hours. As always on such occasions, I locked her into her room. Been I am at home, condescension is not in order."

"I understand," said Keeneyes, "that the only danger to be apprehended to be at liberty, is her resolution to seize upon her child."

"That is true."

"How did she escape from the room?"

"She must have leaped from the window—it is an upper window—out upon that tree. It seems almost impossible that she could have jumped so far, but we found the door locked just exactly as I left it."

Keeneyes walked under the window and measured its distance from the nearest branches of the tree. "No," he said, "it is not impossible. And in her unnatural state of mind, and consequently with her unnatural nervous condition, she might have leaped that far. But you said no one have seen her?"

"The house, as you see, stands back from the road," said the distressed husband, "and the road is a quiet one."

"And when was she missed?"

"I came home at dusk. I was uneasy all the day. I was quite thinking about the child—just as I always am when from home. But I couldn't stay to transact my affairs. I hurried upstairs—unlocked the door—she was gone."

"But the child was safe?"

"Yes, thank God," said the man reverently.

Jansen Moore said to himself, "Surely this cannot be the murderer of his wife's first husband; it is impossible!"

"You gave the alarm at once?"

"Yes."

"You have no idea where she may have gone?"

"None."

"Very good," said Keeneyes, "that you have a secure guard set over your child?"

"I left the search-party and came home."

"Good! Decidedly to protect the child. I concurred to me that she might slip back and steal only the more surely to get it."

"I understand," said Keeneyes. "But how do you know she has left the place at all?"

Phil Deedum looked at him in surprise. "She is gone; I have been home. She is gone. We think she must be hiding in the swamp."

"Yes, yes," said Keeneyes quietly, "of course she must be. The swamp. Yes, Moore, let us get a boat and cross the lake and search in the swamp. Mr. Deedum will you go with us?"

"I think I had better stay here," said Phil Deedum, "in case she should by some unlucky chance escape the searchers and get back here."

"I think you had better go with us," said Keeneyes, in the same tone. However, at present, before you definitely decide, will you come with me and shower me on the other side of the house?"

"Certainly," said Deedum, politely, but couldn't have escaped from the other side," Deedum objected.

"Well, at least you can prove that," said Keeneyes, blandly.

Phil Deedum looked at him in amazement. "I did not follow you."

"Certainly," said Phil Deedum, coldly. The sound of the detective's laughter had not only shocked, but angered him.

As soon as they had turned the corner, Keeneyes stopped and laid his hand upon Phil Deedum's shoulder.

"Mr. Deedum," he whispered, "your wife is crouching in the shrubbery with her eyes upon the light from the nurse's room. While we were talking I saw her bloodless face three times."

Phil Deedum started in agitation, and Jansen Moore felt his heart grow cold.

"Perhaps you remember that humorous story of detective work will be continued in our next number. You will have a great deal of amusement, as well as much mystery and exciting incidents, if you fail to read this capital story to the close. Those sands are subscribing for the Ledger each month, so that they may send regularly the great stories appearing constantly in its pages. We would like to have your name on our list. Look at our premium offers on page thirteen and fifteen, and see if you do not want one of our King Cameras or six of our summer patterns. They are forwarded to you entirely without charge.

Her Mother—What is your husband's income, dear?

Her Married Daughter—Well, it's usually anywhere between 1 and 4 o'clock in the morning.

The First Lady in the Land.

Adam looked at his helpmate thoughtfully.

"Well," he said, in his emphatic way, "there's certainly one honor that is indisputably yours, my dear."

"And what is that, Ad?" queried our first mother.

Adam sublimely smiled.

"Nobody can dispute the claim that you are the first lady in the land," he said.

The Damnation of Father Fitzgerald

(Continued from page five.)

live on?" she asked herself. But she must not think of this, she must put her mind wholly upon his awakening as he had directed. Finally she took up her position by the bed and did not move or murmur again until night had fallen. The priests came and went, the servants wept over the body, and the sisters sat by beside her, but Mercedes sat like a gravestone, staring into the face of her lover and making no sign that any one else was near. When she was addressed she muttered for silence and made no reply. "Demented," was whispered by all as they reached the outer hall.

At last, as the hours of the night commenced to drag themselves by, she dropped on her knees and so remained until after midnight.

The sister who sat with her, and also Father O'Brien, begged of her to go to her chamber and take some rest, but she only shook her head.

Of a sudden, she rose and riveted her eyes on a fly, where they remained until the hands pointed to a quarter of one.

All in the household had retired save the nun who sat with the supposed dead. She now urged Mercedes to lie down and take a little repose.

"Leave me alone with him for an hour while I take my rest," she said. "I would be alone with my dead," she answered. "You, sister, go to your room for an hour or so while I remain. Then I will come and call you and do as you bid."

The nun, who had not after very solemnly, "have you any thought of taking your own life?" she asked, for she feared that this terrible grief to bear. You were weak once, you know."

"You have nothing to fear, dear sister. I pledge you my word that I have no such thought. I am not interposed. "I have much to live for, I must, before I die, bring the guilty to justice and so lift his stain from his fair name. This shall be my sole purpose from now on."

"I am glad to hear you talk like this, Mercedes, and know that you are so grateful. I knew that this strain would prove too great, but am relieved. I see that you have regained your reason. Having her cheek, the sister stole quietly away, respecting the sacredness of grief and thinking that she only wished to be left alone with the dead that she might for the last time pour out her heart to God with no ear to listen, no eye to look on.

Softly closing the door between, the sister sank down on a couch where, being thoroughly exhausted, she immediately fell asleep soon stole over her.

Mercedes stood almost breathless for the next hour, remaining steadfastly into the countenance of the one who lay before her. Then, finally, her face were drawn taut. Her eyes looked as though they must burst from their sockets.

At length she commenced to make passes with her hands over the sleeper. She kept this up for a few minutes, then called forcibly and clearly.

"Fabian, awake, it is Mercedes calling! Fabian, awake! Fabian, awake!"

Then she ceased, still making the passes for some time. He gave no sign. Now she began to tremble with fear and grasped the shoulders of the sleeper and shook him.

"Fabian, awake! Fabian, awake!" she cried, frantically. "Fabian, Fabian, he does not answer! He is dead!" she shrieked. Then, in a wild despair, "Oh, Fabian, it is your Mercedes calling; come back, Fabian! Awake—awake—Oh, Fabian, can't you hear me? Fabian, awake!" she called, now sobbing wildly. "Oh, Fabian, for the love of God, awake—come back to your Mercedes!"

Still there was no answer. She sank down on the bed beside him limp and white, almost mad with despair.

"They will never die! I must not give up," she cried again, springing to her feet. She trembled violently, but controlled herself, renewed her efforts.

"Fabian, awake! Fabian, awake. Oh, God, awake Fabian! Mercedes calls you! Mercedes calls you! Oh, Fabian, in the name of God, awake!"

As there was still no sign, she went to call the sister, abruptly opening the door she stepped into the room and started to rouse her from her mind and soul, but back to look upon her lover.

This dramatic story will be continued in next week's paper, presenting the readers with some very startling episodes and situations. Watch for the end will highly reward you. If you are not a subscriber to the Ledger, you certainly advised to send in the price of subscription at once. If you do so, we will be glad to send you free one of our handsome fall and winter patterns you may select from our pattern page. Look at our advertisement on pages thirteen and fifteen.

Jones and the Telephone.

Jones is a lawabiding citizen of a nearby town. His wrote to a friend that he expected to be married shortly.

The friend, an admirer of Jones, acknowledged with pleasure the letter and requested information as to when the expected arrival be given so that suitable preparations for same him could be made.

Jones, however, wished to surprise his city acquaintance, and did not announce beforehand the date upon which he expected to arrive. Soon after his arrival he sought a telephone with this rather disconcerting result:

"Give me 22 2-22 Grand," he whispered into the transmitter after consulting the telephone directory.

"Grand lost, toot, toot, double toot," was what he thought he heard.

"No, no!" he explained; "I am not on a grand toot—single or double."

Soon a brusque voice thundered into the receiver. "Well!"

"Is this Mr. Clitman's office?" meekly inquired the bewildered Jones.

"Uah, huh!" was the brief response.

"This is Mr. Jones of Glendale——"

"Mr. What?" interrupted the voice.

"Jones!" replied the visitor. "Tell Cutman I'll be——"

"Did you say Bones?"

"Jones—Jones of Glen——"

"All right Mr. Bones, to whom do you wish to speak?"

"Mr. Clitman. I'm a friend of——"

"He is very busy just now. Wait a moment."

"Pardon me, Miss," said Jones several minutes later, when the pleasant voice rose the Grand toot toot toot again, and tell the young man at the other end of the crossing whistle to tell Mr. Clitman that Mr. Jones of Glendale wishes to talk to him at least long enough to express an opinion of him."

"Hello! Hello, Bones——"

"Bones be blowed. This is Jones——"

"Spell it."

"Spell it yourself. You mut drag out a city directory and look at the J's. The one there's the most of is it."

"All right," said the voice; "call up again in about three days. It will take me that long to look up all the Jays that have their names in the directory."

And Jones has returned to Glendale with an improved opinion of that village. It has no telephones.

No Need to Count.

Mr. Jones, possessed of any amount of civic pride and plenty of courage, is always burning to perform numerous deeds of public citizenship. In short, he is bent on doing something" for the benefit of his growing town that he cannot help but know when keep out.

One evening he was passing a building where a political rally was in progress. There was a good deal of noise—quite more than was consistent with Jones' idea of law and order.

"Bosh!" he said to his companions, the light of battle in his eyes, "this won't do. As a result, there isn't a policeman to be seen. But I'm going in there to throw those roisterers out. You stay right here, and one of you come and get me if I need help."

In went Jones, the valorous. In a few minutes all was quiet. Presently the window, Sash, glass and all came with him, and with almost equal suddenness.

"One!"

"You needn't count any more!" called a voice from the gutter, "It's me that came out!"

MRS. CORA B. MILLER MAKES A FORTUNE

Started a Few Years Ago with No Capital, and Now Employs Nearly One Hundred Clerks and Stenographers.

Until a few years ago Mrs. Cora B. Miller lived in a manner similar to that of thousands of other young women, one of the average small town and village. She now resides in her own beautiful brown-stone residence, and is considered one of the most successful business women in the United States.

Mrs. Miller's New Residence, Earned in Less Than One Year.

Several years ago Mrs. Miller learned of a mild and simple preparation that would relieve and cure female ills of a female weakness and piles. She was herself a victim of these troubles, and determined that she decided to furnish it to others who might suffer. She started in with only a few dollars' capital, and the business grew rapidly from the start. Soon it required a large force of clerks, and as the demand grew so rapidly she was several times compelled to move to larger quarters. She now occupies one of the city's largest office buildings, which she owns, and almost one hundred clerks and stenographers are employed in the various business departments.

Million Women Use It.

More than a million women have used Mrs. Miller's remedy, and no matter where you live, you can refer to many cures in your own locality. Mrs. Cass and others will suffer that this preparation has done for them. Mrs. Miller claims that Mrs. Miller's business is so extensive that she is always willing to give aid and advice to every suffering woman who writes her for it. Some of these good women and has decided to give away a million dollars' worth of these medicines $10,000.00 worth absolutely FREE.

Every woman suffering with pains in the head, backache, nervousness, dragging feelings, nervousness, creeping sensations, dizziness, sleeplessness, fear, worry, hot flashes, weariness, or piles from any cause should write at once to Mrs. Miller and her name and address to Mrs. Cora B. Miller, Box 919, Kokomo, Ind., and receive by mail (free of charge in plain wrapper) a 50-cent box of her wonderful medicine; also her valuable book, which every woman should have.

Remember, this offer will not last long, for thousands and thousands of women who are suffering will take advantage of this generous means of getting cured, so if you are ailing, do not suffer another day, but send your name and address to Mrs. Miller for the book and medicine before the $10,000.00 worth is all gone.

Senator G. Raft—When I die I want the following epitaph on my tombstone: "Here lies a Senator and an honest man."

Secretary—Er—won't some people imagine that two men are buried in one grave, sir?

Ladies, Preserve Your Youthful Appearance.

Madame Mignette's Beauty Cream and Skin Food removes every defect, spot, freckle, pimple, blemish or wrinkle, leaving the skin soft, clear and smooth. It is perfectly harmless and will not injure the most delicate skin. It preserves and brings back the youthful glow to the face and ruddiness to the cheeks, preserving it in this condition until extreme old age. This preparation has been used for years and hundreds are now using it and are more than delighted with the results.

Send us ten (10) cents for formula which you can have filled at any drug store at a very small cost. Do not delay, but write at once. Box 491, Blairsville, Pa.

A Paying Partnership.

Struggling Playwright (gloomily)—There is no chance for talent in these days, no chance at all.

Stranger—That's because you don't know how to use your talents. Go into partnership with me, and we'll both make fortunes. All you need to do is to write a ten-act play. I'll get it produced at the Fashion Theater at my own expense and we'll divide the profits.

Playwright—Are you the manager of the Fashion Theater?

Stranger—No, I run the saloon next door.

Wouldn't Risk It.

Tired Tatters—Say, Weary, wot's de matter wid us walkin' down de railroad track?

Weary Walker—Not fer me. I ain't goin' t' disgrace meself by havin' people t'ink I'm a actor.

Out of the Mouths of Babes.

Little Fred—Why is it that women are always complaining about their servants?

Little Elsie—Oh, that's just to let people know they can afford to have 'em.

Teacher—Johnny, can you explain the difference between "like" and "love"?

Johnny—Yes, ma'am. I like bread and but I love pie.

"Oh, mamma," exclaimed little Harold, as he made his first close inspection of an automobile, "this wagon has got rubbers on to keep its wheels from getting wet!"

Little Jack was discovered one day vigorously applying machine oil to the cat's mouth.

"What are you doing that for?" queried his mother.

"So she won't squeak so when I pull her tail," explained Jack.

In Ancient Days.

A roar swept through the ark.

Said Noah: "It's not the rainstorm; Lower the lifeboats! Hark!

The jumbos are having a brain storm!"

Miss Gotrox (sentimentally)—I shall devote my life and money to the poor and needy.

Mr. Flatbroke—Oh, joy! Then you accept my proposal!

Considerate.

Aunt—Tommy! How cruel! Why did you cut that poor worm in two?

Tommy—He seemed so lonely.

A Dainty Little Maid.

Every one ought to have her. She is dressed in pretty colors and changes the color of her skirt herself when it is going to rain. She indicates when it is wise to take an umbrella or when you can do without. She is the simplest and best of barometers. She is an ornament, a good seller for agents, a pretty gift, a good business souvenir and useful to any one. She or one of her sisters comes postpaid with full directions for only 10 cents. W. P. Randolph & Co., 78 Dearborn St., Chicago.

Unconspicuous.

Rural Minister—None of the brothers whose duty it is to pass the plate is here today. Would you object to taking up the collection?

Modest Worshiper—I never passed the plate in church in my life, and I'm afraid I'd be rather awkward.

Rural Minister—Oh, never mind about that. It won't be noticed. Most of my congregation become absorbed in their hymn-books about the time the plate goes round.

Map of the World 25 Cents.

A beautiful map, valuable for reference, printed on heavy paper, 42x64 inches, mounted on rollers, edges bound in cloth, showing our new island possessions, the Trans-Siberian Railway, Pacific Ocean cables, railway lines and other features of Japan, China, Manchuria, Korea and the Far East. Sent on receipt of 25 cents in stamps by W. B. Kniskern, P. T. M., Chicago & North-Western Railway, Chicago, Ill.

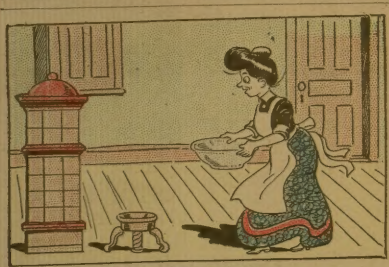
A Small Meeting.

President (New York Rapid Transit Commission)—The attendance today is very small.

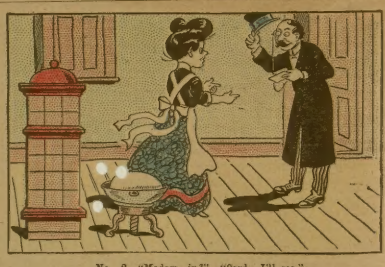
Secretary—All the members are here, sir, except the six who were blown up this week in pavement explosions, the four who were killed by electric-light wires, the ten who were smashed up on the elevated railroad, and in the subway, and the half a dozen who were run over by automobiles in Broadway.

Mrs. Writup—Why did you discharge that nurse, sir?

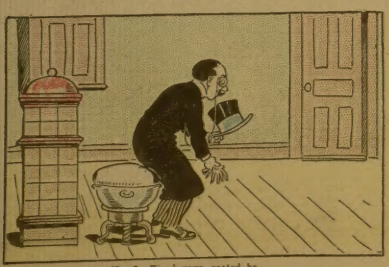
Mrs. De Swell—She kicked poor little Fido just for biting the baby.



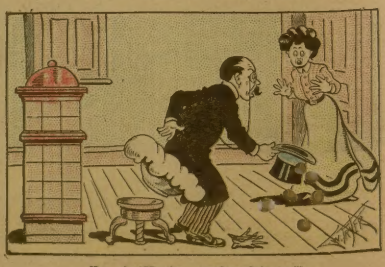
No. 1—Only dough, bread to be.



No. 2—"Madam in?" "Card, I'll see."



No. 3—Tired very, seated be.



No. 4—"Morning, madam—holy gee!"

J°LLITY

COFFEE COMPLEXION

Many Ladies Have Poor Complexions From Coffee.

"Coffee caused dark colored blotches on my face and body. I had been drinking it for a long while and these blotches gradually appeared, until finally they became permanent and were about as dark as coffee itself.

"I formerly had as fine a complexion as one could ask for.

"When I became convinced that coffee was the cause of my trouble, I changed and took to using Postum Food Coffee, and as I made it well, according to directions, I liked it very much, and have since that time used it in place of coffee.

"I am thankful to say I am not nervous any more, as I was when I was drinking coffee, and my complexion is now as fair and good as it was years ago. It is very plain that coffee caused the trouble."

Most bad complexions are caused by some disturbances of the stomach and coffee is the greatest disturber of digestion known. Almost any woman can have a fair complexion if she will leave off coffee and use Postum Food Coffee and nutritious, healthy food in proper quantity. Postum furnishes certain elements from the natural grains for the field that Nature uses to rebuild the nervous system and when that is in good condition, one can depend upon a good complexion as well as a good healthy body. "There's a Reason." Read, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

The Royal Road.

Struggling Author—Why, De Poesy, how prosperous you look! Was your last book of poems a success?

De Poesy—No-o, can't say that it was.

Struggling Actor—Published a popular novel, perhaps?

De Poesy—N-o.

Struggling Author—Ah, then you have written a play. I have always held that play-writing, while not the highest form of art, was nevertheless——

De Poesy—I have written no play.

Struggling Author—You haven't? Where did these fine clothes come from? How did you pay for that handsome turnout?

De Poesy—I have abandoned literature and am peddling clams.

A Dark Deed.

Jay—We came clean from Pittsburg last night.

Hay—The deuce you did, no one ever came clean from Pittsburg.

The Boy Was Too Strong.

"My son tells me you have discharged him," said the office-boy's mother. "It's very strange, you advertised for a strong boy and that's what he is."

"He's too strong, madam," replied the employer; "in the single day he was here he broke all the rules of this office and some of the furniture."

Good Judges of Character.

Passenger (alighting from cab)—What's the charge?

Cabman—One dollar.

Passenger—Well, that's reasonable. I knew by your face that you wouldn't try to be extortionate.

Cabman—Thankee. I knew by your face that you'd be too mean to pay more than the legal fare without a law suit.

Merely a Suggestion.

His mother-in-law had been with them for three long weeks.

"Tomorrow," said his wife, "will be mamma's day, Jay. I wish I could think of something appropriate to give her."

"Why not give her a ticket back home?" suggested Jay, bland.

Hubby.

Mother—Why, Karl, what are you screaming for?

Karl—I fell down in the wood and hurt myself so.

Mother—But did you come crying like that all through town?

Karl—No—I began—on the steps.

Different Now.

The Parson—It must be some consolation to know that you made your late husband happy.

Young Widow—Oh, yes. Poor George was in Heaven till he died.

Calling Names.

Redd—I see monkeys are remarkably keen of sight but deficient in the sense of smell.

Greene—That's the reason we see so many of 'em in automobiles, I suppose?

Mr. Stone—There is one thing I will say you make quite as well as your mother used to make it.

Mrs. Stone—What's that?

Mr. Stone—Trouble.

Got the Wires Crossed.

Servant (to caller)—No, ma'am, Mrs. Biggs is out, ma'am; but she left a message for you.

Caller—Indeed. What was it?

Servant—She said to tell you that—er—that— Oh, I've forgotten what she said, ma'am. Wait a minute and I'll run upstairs and ask her.

How He Was Relieved.

Whyte—So you went to that specialist for your rheumatism. Did he give you relief?

Browne—He relieved me of ten dollars.

The Cost of It.

They were celebrating their engagement by dining at a swell cafe.

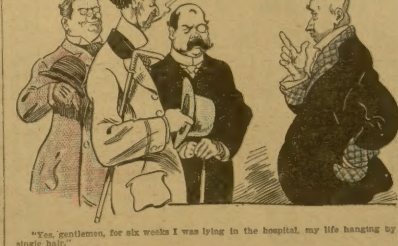
"Do you believe," she queried, as the conversation lagged, "that man is really made of dust?"

"Well," he rejoined, glancing at the dinner check, "he wouldn't be able to travel far in your company if he wasn't."

A Generous Brother.

"Tommy, did you give your brother the best part of the apple, as I told you to?"

Tommy—Yes; I gave him the seeds. He can plant 'em and have a whole orchard.



"Yes, gentlemen, for six weeks I was lying in the hospital, my life hanging by a single hair."

"Which one!"

Admires the Job.

"Prinkly is a self-made man, isn't he?"

"Yes, and he is always giving himself testimonials as to the excellence of the workmanship."

Not Yet, but Soon.

Nan—Has Harry proposed yet?

Fan—Partly. He brought up the subject of divorce when he called the other evening.

Nothing Doing.

"I have a little book here that I think will interest you," said the agent, as he sat down on the farmhouse porch to rest. "It is entitled 'How to Be Your Own Lawyer.'"

"Reckon I don't want no sich fool book as that," replied the old farmer, "cuz they ain't no sense in a man larnin' how t' rob himself, by gum!"

AGENTS WANTED

Nearly all the readers of The Lesson sell or find those advertisements of interest to them. There will be found among them some excellent chances of making money by selling goods of a high class character. Those who are selling such an opportunity either as a regular or temporary occupation, should write the advertisers whose offers follow.

Rider Agents Wanted

in each town to ride and exhibit sample 1907 model. Write for Special Offer. Most liberal $10 to $27 proposition ever made. Boys can easily earn a 1908 Model $7 to $12 Bicycle. Lots of best makes $500 Second-Hand Wheels $3 to $8 all makes and models, good as new. Great Factory Clearing Sale. Orders filled the day we receive them. Don't wait, but write at once for our special offer and 1907 catalogue. Do not buy a bicycle or sundries until you get our latest offer. TEN DAYS' TRIAL. Tires, coaster-brakes, sundries, and parts at half usual prices. Do not wait, but write us a postal and get everything. Do not buy. Write today. Address CYCLE MFG. CO., Dept. W, Chicago.

SALESMEN WANTED.

Men who possess selling ability can get the most for their services by writing us for one of our popular policies of accident and health insurance. Experience not essential. Exclusive territory, and active co-operation given to hustlers. Excellent openings and liberal terms for agents, collectors and district managers. Address, at once,

Dept. 78, Continental Casualty Co., Chicago, Ill.

$8 Paid for 100 names of persons owning a WATCH. Send postal. Address A. W. WATT, CORNELL, WIS.

$150. A MONTH PROFIT & EXPERTS, Dr. C. L. REES, 1441 Penn ave., Pittsburg, Pa.

AGENTS. CREDIT, Perfumes, Flavors, etc. Big profits. Premium Plan. Exclusive territory. HERBERT ARMOUR Co., Box 282, Stn. E, New York.

AGENTS SELL MEDICINES. Every woman wants them. Sell 25 per hundred for 50c and make $1.00. Outfit 10 cents. GUY'S CLARK, HARPER CO., 38-55 Washington St., CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS PORTRAITS $3c, FRAMES 15c, Crayons, Pastels, Water Colors, Sheet Pictures 1c. 30 days credit. Catalogue free. Consolidated Portrait Co., 226 W. Adams St., Chicago.

SELL TOBACCO AND CIGARS. Locally or traveling. Salary or commission. Full time or side line. Steady work. Good pay. Patterson, Lillard Building, TERRE HAUTE, IND. U. S. TOBACCO CO.

"WONDER" STRAW HAT CLEANER

Makes an old hat look like new. Easily sold. Everybody applies. Postpaid, 25 cents package. Agents wanted. C. W. RAMSEY & CO., 1215 Fifth ave., Pittsburg, Pa.

We Make Men's Stylish Clothes to Order.

Send for our samples of cloth. Agents wanted in every town to sell made-to-measure suits at $12.50 to $20.00. PEERLESS TAILORING COMPANY, 163 10th ave., CHICAGO, ILL.

WE WANT AGENTS

in every town to take orders for Custom made Suits and Overcoats. Big money for hustlers. Write for our free Commandment and Sample Book. Everything you need furnished free to those who can do business. You can earn big money working for us. Write today for Sample Outfit. The Westington Co., 46 W. Miller, Dept. 10-L, 178 Adams St., Chicago.

AGENTS learn to flatter on sounding for our Free Book on the eye, it will tell you all about it. We mean that pays you from $25.00 to $50.00 a week (and we will fail) the medical profession will pay you $5.00 for the information. Only a few weeks' study necessary to work at home on all or spare time. Every scholar should have the VALUABLE BOOK. It costs nothing to write for it. Address, THE OPTICAL INSTITUTE, Dept. F, JACKSON, MICHIGAN

MAKE MONEY EASY

Agents wanted in every county to sell the popular Novelty Silverwelt Razor, silver plated, with 6 blades. Send 2c stamp for catalogue. AGENTS EARN $3 to $500 A MONTH. We show you how. Write today. Big profits—quick shipments—prompt returns. Our new selling plan means success to hustlers. Exclusive territory. Our agents are making big money. Write today. Address, SILVERWELT RAZOR CO., 329 BAR STREET, CANTON, O.

NOVELTY OUTLERY CO., 329 BAR STREET, CANTON, O.

BIG MAIL FREE!

Would you like to get a lot of letters, postal cards and papers? Yes, you would. Then send 10 cents for a collection of nearly 500 business houses, wholesale and publishers' names and addresses for the purpose of sending samples, advertising matter, papers and circulars. Our list of AGENT'S DIRECTORY LIST containing names and addresses carefully arranged in alphabetical order. We send these Directory Lists for concerns we know are anxious to receive mail matter for advertising purposes. We will give more mail plainly as the printer will or make it bigger if you wish. Send your name and town also publishers' names so that small collected tongue will reach you when the mail is delivered. Send 10 cents for the Agents' Directory List above stated. Write today. Address

AGENT'S DIRECTORY LIST, NEVADA, Indiana County, PENNA.

editor of this paper who will tell you we are reliable. All we ask is that you send 10 cents in silver and we will enter your name in our Agents' Directory List above stated. Write today. Address

AGENT'S DIRECTORY LIST, NEVADA, Indiana County, PENNA.

When answering advertisements you will favor the advertiser and the publishers by mentioning The Chicago Ledger.

TWO FACES UNDER ONE HAT.

By H. E. SCOTT.

Author of "The Pretty Typewriters," "The Girl from Nacoupin," etc.

[Copyright by the Author.]

Begun in No. 21, May 25. Subscriptions can begin with that issue or back copies can be obtained from news stands, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER XXIV.

FACE TO FACE.

"Philip Bally? Hold, gentlemen!" cried Merrill, trembling in every limb. "Philip Bally? Did you say Philip Bally?"

Yes, yes!" cried the wretch, in a choking voice. "I did not lie! They are the lines, and in proof, you will find my name on the inner side of my watch. I am from Chicago."

John Merrill reeled and nearly fell: "Your watch!" he cried. "Where? Where? Quick!"

"In the watch pocket of my pants," was the reply. "If they will turn me loose I will prove it to you. Oh, save me, save me! I am Philip Bally!"

John Merrill had already seized him with a force that caused him to cry out, and started the red blood flowing afresh from his shoulder.

The next instant he had withdrawn from its resting-place a gold watch.

All eyes were upon him, as with trembling fingers he forced open the back case. "Saved! Saved!" he cried, as he sank on his knees beside the panting wretch. "My God, I thank Thee! The name engraved on the watch case is that of Philip Bally of Chicago, Illinois."

"Whatever it is," exclaimed Jo Wells, "you will not save him! Away with him, men. The wretch has lived too long. Remember Charley Wells!"

Again the rope tightened.

"Hold! Hold!" cried Merrill, leaping to his feet, grasping the taut rope, and setting him his feet. "In God's name hold! If you have this man, you must murder me! I have a prior claim on his life. He shall hang, but not you, not now! This man on the fourteenth day of last September, near the town of Coulton, in southern Wisconsin, murdered my friend and benefactor, Philip Bally. For this crime I am a fugitive, for it was laid at my door.

"I was arrested, and as the evidence would have condemned me, made my escape. A reward for my apprehension is now hanging over my head—I have had the watch in my hands many times. This man is not Philip Bally but his murderer!

"Gentlemen, in God's name listen to me! Remember I am an exile for this man's crime. My friend and partner yesterday morning left for Golden Gulch to purchase supplies; he will return and verify all I say.

"Then this is not his first murder. Drag him to the cottonwood, and you will hear the tale. If, as he says, he has prior claim on this man's life—can prove it, and stands in danger of the latter from a crime committed by him—we must give him a chance to clear his name. But the murderer of Charley Wells don't go from my sight until the last breath has left his carcass. Die he shall!"

Five minutes later, with all the miners seated at the base of the cottonwood and Philip Bally's murderer lying before him with the noose yet encircling his neck, John Merrill told the tale that led to Mark Perry's being a fugitive.

It was curious to watch the workings of the features of the murderer, as he proceeded.

"I am gaining nothing but time," he thought, "at the hand of the man. Well, time is everything. There is always a chance to escape for a man as slick cripples. If it won't for this broken leg—well, they will have to try me if they get me back to Coulton. They will not hang a man with a broken leg. This fellow broke Jeff—may do the same. It won't be the first time. At least, I won't die now."

"Yes, your story seems to be a good one, young man," said Mr. Wells, as John Merrill concluded. "You are suffering for this hound's crime. The hand of Providence is in it. But I can't see how the vampire found out that Bally was to be there with the money, if he committed the crime."

"He may have ascertained the fact in Chicago, and followed him out on the same train," said Merrill.

"Well, if he is guilty of that crime," said Wells, "he must go back to Coulton. If not, he must go home here and now. What say you, men?"

"I can settle this matter," muttered the guilty wretch. "I was lying in a meager desire of a drunk where this man Mark Perry had left me. I heard him say that as how Bally was coming on the five o'clock with ten thousand dollars cash to take up mortgages. I laid for him, and though he came in on an earlier train, I knew my man.

"I followed him out, and when near the creek I did the job. I didn't go to kill him, but he seized my coat after I had knocked him down and secured his money and watch; I gave him the dirk. I heard some one coming and I dashed away through the brush, leaving my dirk behind. I was in Chicago the next day. A button from my old army coat was missed. I suppose it came off in Bally's hand.

"I put most of the money in the faro dens on Clark street, but I hung on to the watch, and when I come out West took the name of Philip Bally. Now you know all about it, but if you don't keep me from bleeding to death you'll lose the man who never get me to Coulton alive. I'm gettin' thirst.

"Fetch! Fiend!" cried Merrill, "and I must minister to you!"

"It will be a pleasure to you, under the circumstances," he said with a leer.

"You can never know how great a one," observed Merrill, arising to his feet.

He offered the wretch water, and brought out bandages and a bottle of brandy.

The hurt in the shoulder proved to be but a flesh wound, and this was soon staunched and the wound bound up securely. Splints were prepared and the leg, which was broken below the knee, was carefully set, three rough miners who were thirsting for his blood.

While they were yet talking the matter over, Arthur with three mules arrived. He was struck with alarm at seeing the group beneath the cottonwood. He feared they were outlaws, but a glad cry from the lips of John Merrill reassured him.

He had his arms around his neck by the time he had dismounted.

"What in Heaven, John Merrill?"

"John Merrill no longer, dear Arthur! I am again Mark Perry. Then lies the murderer of Philip Bally! He it is for whose crime I have suffered. These friends tracked him to our camp for a second murder. We will bear back to Coulton the assassin of our old friend."

"God bless you, Mark! It was a fortunate day for us that we located in Dead Man's Gulch."

Mark introduced his partner, and an hour later the group, with the exception of Jo Wells, returned to their camp.

"We will carry him in the shanty," said Mark, "and I will get supper. What is your name?" he added, as he stooped to raise the man's shoulders.

"If any one asks you, tell them you don't know," was the reply of the wretch, who now saw a longer lease of life than he had dared hope for yesterday.

There was little sleep for the watchers that night, nor was there much for the assassin of Philip Bally.

The following morning Jo Wells returned to Dismount Oaks to gaze for the last time on the features of his murdered brother. Then, wife-wise, at nightfall he mounted.

With him a sheeuce our friends had, bagged their output and arranged their packs. And with their prisoner strapped on one of the mules the following morning, the party filed out of the gulch en route for Denver.

Jo Wells rode directly in the rear of the murderer, with a revolver in his hand. "I am only sorry he has not two lives to render up," he said; "but Mark's bullet will be a great satisfaction—and when he hangs I can think that he died for Charley's murder, as well as Philip's."

"Then the difference!" leered the wretch. "But I ain't hung yet."

CHAPTER XXV.

AN INTERRUPTED CEREMONY.

When Mark returned to her room, on the night of the 15th of September, it was not to sleep. It was to bemoan the fact that she would become the wife of Wife of Caleb Marsh.

"A few hours more," she exclaimed, as she placed her head on the pillow, "and I shall have paid off the mortgages that hang over my father's farm. Oh, my poor old father, this sacrifice I make that your heart may not run be fully crushed by the loss of Elwood! But Arthur, my father, will never return to claim the old place at your hands. Surely, my brother is long since dead, and when you are called away Elwood will fall to the wife of Caleb Marsh.

"Mr. Marsh must know that I wonder if he believes what he says, when he tells father from day to day that he will live to welcome his son home and see him master of Elwood. Why should he say so else? Perhaps he fears that if father believed my brother dead he would not care so much to preserve Elwood. No, I must not be unjust, he but thinks to buoy him up with hope.

"Poor Mark, how I loved you! Just one year ago that murder was committed. It might have been at this very hour that you escaped from jail. Why—why, did you fly? My heart yet cries out that you were not guilty of that fiendish murder. But I shall never gaze upon your face again. I shall ever bear your image in my heart. Even as the wife of Caleb Marsh, my kindest thought of him will be that he would have expended his money in your defense, and that he had faith in you until you fled.

"Mr. Marsh knows that I do not love him, yet does he not say to me to the altar, He has done so much for father. Yes, and for me. Why, my bridal outfit will be the envy of half the girls in Coulton. Oh, how gladly would I forsake all else and the love of Mr. Marsh to some one of them. Ah, no, that course would not release Elwood. That course would plunge my father into despair.

"I must try, God help me, to love my husband after all he has done for us. Love him, yet Love Caleb Marsh! Impossible! Oh, as the hour approaches I grow more and more unhappy. Standing at the altar I shall be as a maiden at the stake bare by my open grave. Horrible! Horrible! I must not, will not, feel so!"

She threw open a closet door and reached within for her wedding gown and finery, which she laid upon the bed.

"What should be my joy causes me to tremble with terror," she said. "Is it true? I know Mr. Marsh worships me. I must not be a living mockery! Oh, God! Easter said than done. I shuddered with repulsion when he kissed me at parting for the first time. There, let me place these things back; there is time enough tomorrow—yet but little time."

She restored the articles to the closet, and throwing herself down on the bed again.

At ten o'clock on the morning of the 15th, two carriages were driven in at the double gate at Elwood and halted before the house.

Yes, that is Caleb Marsh that descends from one, and when the bridal party reaches Coulton few will recognize him. A satisfied smile is on his face. His dark, fashionable broadcloth suit rests lily on his ungainly figure, and a beaver hat sits well back on his head of hair. His hands are encased in gloves—yes, kid gloves, and he carries a cane. "The groom," remarks the reader? Not so long drawn out conversation, Sarah. You know the ceremony is set for eleven o'clock. You must hurry up the toilet of the bride, Caleb Abner loses no time. You look crushing!"

"Why so?"

Sarah Marsh had in fact been determined that on the occasion of the payment of mortgages no one in the little church at Coulton should have occasion to say that she was not doing full justice to the occasion, and never before had she been so extravagantly arrayed.

"All ready, Abner?" exclaimed Caleb a moment later, as the bridal party was ushered the parlor where the farmer was seated. "Ah, you are, and you look twenty years younger than I, Abner, once perhaps. I don't wonder, for I feel shaky."

Caleb Marsh was a fine looking man. You will take Coulton by storm, you and Sarah, when you are both dressed. You look another man. I'm proud of you, sir, you look like a—like a millionaire."

"I expect to be worth a million before twelve o'clock tonight," thought Caleb.

"Sarah," exclaimed Abner, "I declare, dressed up you make a distinguished looking woman! That party will create a sensation sure. Go right up to my daughter's room! They are dressing her now."

Sarah Marsh, she was not used to compliments from either Abner or his brother, gave the farmer one of her most fetching smiles, and hastened up the stairway.

"It only Arthur was here this day," said Abner, "I should have nothing more to ask."

"When he does come," said Caleb, "you can transfer him a farm with a clear title. The mortgages are in my pocket with the releases duly signed. As soon as the words are spoken that make Mark Perry's wife I will hand them to you. Ah, I hear them coming already!"

Sarah, with Kate and her maid, entered the room.

"My sweet bride!" exclaimed Caleb, "you look as charming as a May morning!" and he seized one of her hands and pressed it to his lips.

"Keep your hands off, Caleb!" cried his sister. "Brides can't be touched. You will disarrange something. Oh, she looks beautiful! Of course she is nervous and scared, and her face is pale; but by the time we reach Coulton there will be color there."

"I am glad you are pleased with my appearance, Mr. Marsh," said Kate, trembling beneath his admiring gaze.

"Pleased! I am more than pleased! I am delighted!" was the reply. "Well, let us be off. In less than an hour we may stand before the parson."

"The—the—Mr. Parson," said Kate, turning to her maid, a neighbor's daughter, "I think I left my handkerchief on the bureau."

Miss Thorn hurriedly left the room.

"Excuse me, Mr. Marsh," said Kate, "but the mortgages?"

"Oh, yes," observed Caleb, flushing slightly, "I was just talking to your father about them. Here they are," and he withdrew them from his pocket. "You can see, my sweet Kate, that on each a release is signed. When the words are spoken that make you my wife, I will transfer them to your father. Not as my gift alone, for half of my possessions will have become yours when I promise to endow you with all my worldly goods."

BOYS MAKE MONEY

DURING VACATION, SELLING THE

BLADE AND LEDGER

WE WANT AGENTS EVERYWHERE to sell these two great papers. 25,000 boys are making money every week selling them, but we want MORE—we want agents in every town and city. No city is too large—no town is too small—for a BLADE and LEDGER Agency.

WE PAY THE LARGEST COMMISSION to agents. You can make more money in less time selling our papers than any other way. They sell at sight.

YOU PAY NOTHING until your papers are sold. We send Agent's Outfit free. You sell the papers on Friday and Saturday, and you do not pay for unsold copies.

SEND IN YOUR APPLICATION TODAY. Don't wait until some other fellow gets the job—write to us at once. A postal card will do.

WRITE TO W. D. BOYCE CO., BOYCE BUILDING, CHICAGO, ILL.

Five minutes later Caleb and his sister were whirled away in one carriage, while Abner, his daughter and Miss Thorn followed in the other.

The presence of Miss Thorn in the carriage probably served to keep Kate from giving way to her unhappy emotions during the drive to town; but her eyes were dimmed with tears during the greater portion of the time.

"It is not natural, my child, that tears should dim your eyes on this occasion," said her father, "but there are few brides that do not shed tears as the most important epoch in their lives approaches. They are not unhappy tears, I am sure you will be a happy wife, the wife of a man who will love you tenderly."

Kate hid her face in her gloved hands and hardly could she help but cry aloud when the fatal spot was passed where Philip Baily had yielded up his life.

"Oh, if Mr. Horton had but rescued me from this fate!" she thought. "But why should I be unhappy?"

As the party was passing the little station, the express from Chicago came thundering down the track and halted at the depot.

Would God relief might come from there!" thought Kate. "But no, it is too late, too late!"

At eleven o'clock they entered the vestibule of the church.

"This way, my daughter!"

Kate took her father's arm, and they proceeded down the aisle of the church; Marsh and his sister were following in the one opposite them.

There was a hum of voices as they passed forward. It emanated from those who were seated in the pews of the little church. Many faces Kate would have recognized but for the wild confusion of her mind.

Well in front was seated Sheriff Root and his wife, while Dobbins, Starks and Cleaver were close back of them.

Doctor Doan and his wife were seated on the opposite side of the aisle.

"This marriage is a sin in the sight of God," whispered the doctor to his wife.

"You can see, even through her veil, how unhappy the poor girl looks. She becomes the wife of Marsh to save her father from perjury. Look! Caleb Marsh's cold face is flushed with triumph as he endeavored a young and handsome bride, and Elwood goes with her—I hear he will reside in Chicago, but he knows he safely may."

"Hush! You may do the man injustice."

Side by side, Caleb and the trembling bride are now standing before the altar.

Never did Kate's ear drink in words as can be heard these words, as they fall from the divine's lips: "If any present can show cause why they may not lawfully be joined together in wedlock, let them now speak, or forever hold their peace."

There is a moment's silence, after which the minister's voice is heard again:

"Caleb Marsh, wilt thou have this woman to be thy wedded wife, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy bonds of matrimony? Wilt thou love her, comfort her, honor and keep her in sickness and in health; and forsaking all others, keep the only unto her, so long as ye both shall live?"

"Hold! Hold! I forbid this union!" and from a group who were entering the church an athletic-appearing young man, seemingly greatly agitated, strode hastily down the aisle.

The beard that had covered his face when he left Bald Eagle Gulch behind had been removed, and notwithstanding his bronzed appearance he was recognized by all.

"Mark Percy, the murderer of Philip Baily!" exclaimed several voices.

"Mark! Mark!" cried Kate as she fell forward.

"Very strange," muttered the old clergyman. "Very!"

Abner Ellis was for a moment paralyzed where he stood.

Caleb Marsh was the picture of consternation, but a new light soon gleamed on his eyes.

"Sheriff Root," he exclaimed, "your prisoner has returned! Do your duty!"

The sheriff came forward, followed by Dobbins and Cleaver.

"Unhand my sister, bride!" cried Caleb. "Off with your murderous hands! This is most unfortunate, but let the ceremony proceed. Abner, stand apart, and Elwood will have been one again. Rouse man."

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

THE BALLOON BOYS;

Or, THE WIZARDS OF THE AIR. By COL. LAWRENCE LESLIE.

[Copyright by W. D. Boyce Co.]

Begun to No. 23, June 8. Subscriptions can begin with that issue or back copies can be obtained from news stands, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER XIII.

IN A MICHIGAN LUMBER TOWN.

From the manner in which Bob spoke, it was evident that he had quite made up his mind to accomplish a certain thing.

Pete showed his enthusiasm even without knowing what was really in the wind.

Perhaps he expected great things to happen before they started on Northern fair.

He saw his companion before dropping to a lower level, take the glass and with it look long and earnestly over their back course.

There was no need of asking questions as to why this concerned him.

"I see it," he said, finally.

"The other balloon?"

"Yes. They kept the professor longer than I thought would be the case. It gives us several hours start, at least."

Then they began to drop from their high altitude and as they drew near the fair grounds it amused them to see the great excitement their coming occasioned.

A fair is a great event in this region, and though the summer had not been as prosperous as the people could have wished, it was at least an average one, and farmers rejoiced in the Harvest Home.

Presently the hoarse sound of many voices could be heard.

The people, realising that the unknown aeronauts intended dropping upon the fair grounds were enthusiastically welcoming their coming.

It was an unexpected sensation.

They had not counted on this when paying the admittance fee.

The cheers grew in volume.

Bob was thankful indeed for it was his desire to make a good landing.

An aeronaut has the same pride in this than an amateur sailor shows, when rounding up at a dock or buoy.

His good judgment and entire lack of wind enabled him to drop into the open space of the campus, among the crowd.

A score of willing hands seized upon the trailing ropes and when these were snubbed upon several posts the business was accomplished.

A dense crowd surrounded them.

Many questions were asked, but the young aeronaut replied in a joking way without committing themselves.

The managers of the fair, who greeted them in a warm manner, bidding the sky travelers welcome, they gave a brief outline of their trip.

Bob knew what it was to have friends, and he had had a most delightful reception of this in the way the lumbermen retained the balloon in order to give them a start of hours.

He told enough of his story to suit the circumstances, and endue the sympathy of the Wolverines.

From up in the sky flew the news that a second balloon was in pursuit of the first.

Many thought it would head to the south, but as yet they were unable to discover it, which had been so apparent to our voyagers when a mile or more above the earth, and aided by glasses.

Bob desired to take advantage of the precious time, every minute of which was worth money, in working off their foes might put a different face on matters.

He left Pete on guard, and the latter was very willing to take charge so long as Pettie Barbara remained too.

In his eyes the child was a little queen, and she found a faithful subject in the young athlete who had dolighted the patrons of the saw-dust ring by his feats of agility.

So while the people thronged about the great gas monster, Pete answered questions with considerable tact, and made friends by reason of his genial disposition.

Some boys have a magnetic qualities in this line, and the ex-circus performer was one of them.

He began to cast anxious eyes in the direction of the southern sky.

Already people discovered a black spot far away, which they immediately knew must be the second balloon.

Every minute the excitement increased.

The exhibits were forgotten, side shows neglected.

Here was a novelty, the like of which had never before been seen in these parts, and they prepared to enjoy it to the full.

Where was Bob all this while?

He had brought his powers to bear—as a reader of human nature he was able to pick out a certain individual in the crowd who might be of some assistance to him.

The gentleman was the friendly selectal was one of the officers of the fair, seeing that he wore a badge, and had a horsey look.

Bob entering into conversation with him made a pleasing impression.

He had met an old friend, who some years before had been connected with the [illegible]

Having given up life in the tented ring, and raised a beard, it was little wonder he had failed to recognize Andy Sedge, but as soon as he gave his name the other gripped his hand, revealing his identity.

A hurried mutual recital of events ensued. Andy's story was romantic, in that he had wedded a rich farmer's daughter, and was raising fancy cattle on a farm in this region, besides running a large lumber camp in Winsor.

He was enthusiastically with Bob in his plans, just as soon as he heard his story.

Here was luck.

With Aleck as a guide the young aeronaut felt his chances were considerably improved.

He could not regret the time spent in discussing the matter.

So he put questions, which Aleck answered in a direct way.

Bob's hopes arose.

It was not a shadow he was chasing then, but something of a sensible nature.

He saw that the afternoon was wearing away, and knew the time was short.

Besides, that rival balloon was all the while lessening the distance, and in the course of time he would have bitter rivals on the ground, unscrupulous foes ready to enter into even the most desperate game in order to crown him.

They left the fair grounds.

The town was just such as may be found here and there in the pine woods of Michigan.

Many such are connected by railroads, while others lie upon the rivers.

Logging is the usual vocation of the people, although many own farms.

They are a warm-hearted, sympathetic class, and ready of distress, when blizzard sweeps across the peninsula i.e. winter leaving death in its track, or a terrible forest fire in the dry August, appeals for help from any stricken community, are sure of immediate response.

Into town plunged the two friends.

Andy could lead his comrade direct to the house where the Widow Muscroft lived.

There was a strange story about her life, he declared, since few people ever saw her husband.

She lived with her brother, and seemed to be in confinement—indeed, it was generally understood in the neighborhood that she was not exactly right in her mind, and her brother refused to circulate this information, Andy declared.

"I saw her once, we met by accident at a narrow foot bridge. I waited for her to pass, and she thanked me so sweetly—I have never forgotten it."

Bob was very much excited when his friend said this.

"And you have seen her, the one I have reason to believe is my mother. Tell me how she looked."

"I couldn't describe her. She was a sweet, lovely lady. Her face was marked by sadness, but I can't believe she is any way crazy."

"Oh! I hope not, I pray not. If you could only realize how I feel, Andy. Tell me, is there any way I can meet her by accidents with him."

"Oh! perhaps your helping me would injure you financially," said Bob, quickly.

"Not at all. Muscroft and myself are associations with the Gogebic tomorrow I'd do just as well. He has control of many lumber enterprises in this section, and these will have to spend a large portion of his time here, although he only too gladly turn back to Detroit where he lives in great style, they say."

"And he keeps his poor sister up here?"

"Always."

"Is he here now?"

"Yes, he came this morning, unexpectedly."

"Then it is not his custom to be in this town at this time of the year?"

"No. Winter and spring are his months. I wondered what brought him up in winter."

"And I can give a good guess," said Bob, frowning.

CHAPTER XIV.

BEARDING THE LION IN HIS DEN.

Andy announced the fact that they were near the Muscroft place.

It consisted of acres of ground with a high fence all around. It has always been a mystery to the people of the place, among the good people of the place, none of whom, it is said, they have taken it for granted that the affair in all its [illegible] mind has a good deal to do with it."

"You are right."

Her attendant was never seen behind. She never goes out upon the grounds without that woman hovering near."

Bob surveyed the black fence with peculiar sensations, for on the other side of it he believed would be found a solution of the mystery of his life.

No wonder he felt his heart thrill with the keenest excitement.

Hope battled with fear, and rose bouyant above it, whenever it got the best.

"How shall we get inside?" he asked.

"There is a gate, of course, but I imagine we would have a hard time to get by. Hinder such well trained athletes from climbing over fences."

"Nothing that I can see."

To determine was to act.

They found a tree that overtopped a fence of the fence, and mounting this, it was a matter of gratitude to go over.

Once within the confines of the enclosure they found themselves among trees.

Andy assumed the lead, as he was supposed to have some knowledge of the place.

Thus they advanced in the direction of the house, glimpses of which they soon be gan to get through the trees.

It was an odd affair, with numerous porches, and seemed more adapted to a Southern clime than that of Michigan.

Still, such a house must be quite very comfortable with means to accomplish it.

All this time the two intruders kept their eyes on the alert for any party.

A man was working in front of the house, and his looks proclaimed him a gardener.

If Squire Muscroft was at home, they had not as yet set eyes on him.

Instead of advancing boldly to the house, they passed along in the shelter of some tall bushes that gave them an opportunity to reach one of the side porches unseen.

Bob looked white in the face—his ears caught the sad notes of a violin some one played with deep feeling that could only spring from a heart overpowered by grief. They entered a hall.

The music came from a side room, and toward this they turned, to discover the Squire's sister standing there—the musical instrument held in one hand, her gaze seeming to be fastened on some object outside, which however, she observed vacantly, her thoughts being far away.

At their entrance she started up and turned in amazement—strangers were a rarity here.

Bob was impulsive.

He had intended waiting while the other addressed the lady, but when he saw [illegible] upon her he could not restrain himself.

So they stood face to face, eager, excited—it was an hour of which they had dreamed.

The lady seemed to fear this was a phantasy of her mind, but Bob soon proved himself to be a creature of flesh and blood by springing forward with the cry of:

"My mother!"

They mingled their tears.

Explanations were indulged in, and yet how entirely unnecessary they were when heart spoke so eloquently to heart.

Long had she anticipated this meeting, and it was the only thing that had kept her alive.

The unscrupulous Squire, whose hand was back of it all, had given her to believe that her own child was dead, and shaped thus to crush her spirit.

When Bob told what suspicions he entertained with regard to Pettie Barbara, her joy came near overpowering her, and the boy was compelled to be her support.

In the midst of their eager confidences, who should walk in but the Squire himself.

He was a portly, red-faced individual.

Bob hated him on sight, and would have done so on general principles even were other motives lacking.

He did not appear astonished, though there was a gleam in his eye.

Bob saw the tyrant, and remembering what both his mother and Pettie had suffered from this scheming villain, it was with difficulty he refrained from launching himself upon him.

It would have done him a world of good to have had a few minutes' fistic work such as he had learned from a pugilist who lived with Andy somewhere about his uncle's well fed frame.

"So, you are here, eh, you young rascal. I've been looking for you, before I start for my balloon, eh? It'll be some time before you get back, and your interfering with private grounds is an offense that will cost you dear."

"James, it is useless to keep up this deception any longer. I know all. This is my son. You remember—part us again," said the lady with some show of determination.

He sneered as he replied:

"My sweet Mary, you deceive yourself. This is only a clever young imposter who seeks to take advantage of your lonely heart, and the affection of your lost children. He has come to the wrong shop when he seeks any such game. I'm not running—I am prepared."

Bob knew that the bare-back rider must have telegraphed on to him as soon as he realized what the young aeronaut's plans were.

It was a strange situation.

Bob realized that he must act.

To defy the Squire was his first impulse, and if such an act could be impolite, since the man was powerful in this region where his money controlled so many enterprises.

It was a crisis he had hardly prepared for.

A bold stroke might cut the Gordon knot—at any rate it would cause his enemy to show his hand.

So he stepped forward, and with cutting words defied the Squire to do his worst, acute just what he thought of him, and at the same time devised he meant to break up the other's evil plans even at the risk of his life.

Squire Muscroft only laughed at this tirade.

He seemed quite sure of his ground.

"We'll see about that," he said, and stepping to the door, he gave several peculiar pashas summon their slaves, when a tall man, in the manner of a constable, stepped into the room and clasped Bob's arm.

CHAPTER XV.

A STRANGE OFFICER OF THE LAW.

"Take him away, Mr. Carter. I am responsible for the trespass. I have been caught on my grounds. Lock him up," said the Squire, with a lofty wave of the arm.

"I offer to go his bail, Squire," remarked Andy.

"What! you here, and on his side, Mr. Sedge. You must understand that after this, all business between us is at an end."

"Just as you please, Squire—it makes no difference to me. I repeat that I stand about bail. You as magistrate must name the amount."

"I refuse. This is no bailable case."

"Well, I'll think not, as that you have no business to carry such a high hand. I'll go before another squire and swear out a warrant against you."

Hang your impudence, Sedge."

"No more than your own, sir. This young fellow is an old friend of mine."

"Oh, I remember, you were a circus lad, too."

"That shows you know about his past."

"Squire Muscroft—"

"He is nothing to me but a trespasser. Oh! brother, give me the evidence and let me take my [illegible] to the lockup. I money I care to bring for, if the stored to me."

"Poor Mary, still harping on that old story. I have neither time nor patience to argue it. Mr. Constable, do your duty."

"Will you come with me peaceably, sir?"

"Oh! I'll go quietly enough, for it would be folly resisting a man of your size.

FITS CURED When I say cured, I mean a radical cure. I have made the disease of Fits, Epilepsy or Falling Sickness a life-long study and Warrant my remedy to positively cure the worst cases. Because others have failed, is no reason for treating me a Free Bottle of my infallible remedy. Give Express and Postoffice address. PROF. W. H. PEERS, F.D., 4 Cedar St., New York.

Spanish Needles, Rods, Goldmasters for Locating Gold, Silver and hidden treasures. Circulars free. Agents wanted. Cat. 2 cents. Miners Supply Co., Dept. H., Palmyra, N.Y.

PATENTS SECURED or fee returned. Free opinion as to patentability. Illustrated Guide Book, and List of Inventions Wanted, sent free. EVANS, WILKINS & CO., WASHINGTON, D. C.

SONG POEMS WANTED. $25 Monthly Salaries Paid. Publishers Proposition. We Compose and Arrange melody FREE of charge. EDO. JAMES MUSIC CO. 167 W. 70th St., Chemical Bl'd'g.

MAKE MONEY BY RAISING POULTRY. Pleasant and Profitable Work. We will send "Poultry Lessons from Nature" postage prepaid, with each yearly subscription to COMMERCIAL POULTRY, at 50c a year; 5 mos. trial for 10c. Send for free sample. Box 13, Commercial Poultry Publishing Company, Hartselles, Ill.

MORPHINE FREE TRIAL TREATMENT
Opium and all drug habits. Painless. Permanent Home Cure. Nervous and physical vitality restored to their normal condition. A full trial treatment sent free. Write us in confidence. ST. PAUL ASSOCIATION, Suite 1211-65 Van Buren St., Chicago

McGINTY WATCH

Guaranteed for 20 years. Fit for Tic, cowboy said. UNITED SPECIALTY CO., 84 Dearborn St., Dept. 97, Chicago

YOUR FORTUNE Told Free
by the world's greatest Astrologer. Send me your name and address, the date of your birth, and 4 cents in stamps and I will send you a Horoscope of your life from birth to death with a special forecast for 1907. I have made others happy and believe I can help you.
PROF. LEE, Dept. 8, NATICK, MASS.

MENDING TISSUE
The WONDER of the Age. No sewing or darning. Repairs clothing, silk, satin, cotton goods, ribbons, fabrics of all kinds, kid gloves, Parasols, oil clothing, parasols, stockings, etc. Package assorted colors, 15 cents. 25 cents. Joseph Dyas Publishing Co., Pearl St., New York.

When answering advertisements you will avoid the advertiser and the publishers by mentioning The Chicago Ledger.

"Which shows you to be a smart lad, Squire, you're responsible for all this."

"Entirely, Mr. Carter. Take the young cub out of my sight at once. If you keep him safe in the lockup until tomorrow I'll cancel that little note I hold, which has given you so much worry."

"A thousand thanks, young fellow, come on with me and I'll make you comfortable."

Bob gave his mother one embrace.

"I will never give up until we are united, and this unnatural brother of yours meets his Waterloo. He may have the upper hand now, but Heaven will not permit him to persecute us much longer. I tell him plainly his hour is near at hand. Now, Mr. Officer, I am ready."

The young fellow's manner impressed Squire Muscroft deeply, and as the two moved away together he looked after them, an expression of surprise on his face.

Perhaps for the first time he began to feel that a new element had crossed his path that would yet encompass his defeat.

Andy stopped to tell the Squire what he thought of such action, and although the other blustered considerably, and uttered threats, the ex-circus rider snapped his fingers under his nose and walked away.

Meanwhile Bob and the marshal were on the way to the lockup.

As the Muscroft place was outside of town they would have ten minutes walk ahead.

The officer looked around.

There was something on his mind, that was sure.

"He ain't coming along, is he?" demanded Mr. Carter.

"Oh! no. He places full dependence on you."

At this the officer chuckled.

"As a usual thing I'm marked dangerous, and few men ever escape after I've clapped a hand on 'em. Of course I'm no fool. If a prisoner should suddenly poke a revolver under my nose, I've too much respect for my life to fight. Ye see I keep my six-shooter stickin' out of this pocket. S'pose you suddenly snatched it out and covered me—I'd just throw up my arms like this and sing out: 'Don't shoot—I surrender.'"

Smash went the china.

Bob saw light.

The kind-hearted marshal believed his story and was offering him a chance to escape, even at the risk of losing caste among his fellows.

It was a crisis, and the young fellow dared not let the opportunity pass him by.

Coolly he put out his hand.

His fingers clutched the butt and with a sweeping movement he drew it forth.

"Surrender, Mr. Carter."

Up went the marshal's hands again, and upon his face came a really ludicrous expression of terror.

"Hold on, Bob. I landed that thing myself."

"Glad to know it."

"It's done up to kill. In the hands of a reckless young rider like you, it might go off, and then good-by to Long'd be marshal."

"Then be reasonable, Mr. Carter."

"I'm the most reasonable man in Michigan. What d'ye want me to do?"

"I declare I hardly know."

"Reckon you'll be splicing my hands together, and tyin' me up to a tree here, while ye run back and kidnap the lady. Well, as I said before, I know when to extend in a tight corner. That's now, and I ain't goin' to lose the number of my mess for Squire Muscroft."

"How can I thank——"

"None of that, young man. Better not let me catch you napping. I give you fair warning."

"But he said he had a note of yours which he would destroy if you kept me safe."

"My lad, a thousand notes wouldn't pay me for carrying out any part of his devilish plot. That note will do him little good, for he can never find anything of mine to lay on, as I carry all I possess on my back. Now you've caught me unawares, and I'm your prisoner. Tie my hands, for I'm a desperate man, and I might do you harm. I suppose you'll search me and find the stout cord I carry in the left-hand pocket of my coat."

"To be sure I will," declared Bob, cheerfully accepting the situation in its singular entirety.

He quickly drew out a quantity of stout whip cord.

"Now we'll fix you, my good man. Hold out your hands."

Groaning, the marshal obeyed.

In a minute he was a prisoner.

Bob could have wrung the noble fellow's hand in extreme gratitude, but he saw that the other desired him to carry out to the end the clever scheme he himself had so adroitly instituted.

So he caused the marshal to back up against a tree, to which he bound him hand and foot with the remainder of the cord.

"Are you going to leave me here?" asked the marshal.

"That's my purpose. Will you swear to remain quiet until help comes, or shall I be compelled to put a rag in your mouth?" Bob demanded.

"I give you my word, young fellow. This is bad enough—don't humiliate me too much."

"Mr. Carter, I believe you. Excuse me for taking your revolver with me."

"No apologies. Promise me one thing."

"I'd do before you mention it."

"If you get the chance give that fat rascal of a Squire one good kick for me. I've said it. So along young fellow, and let me chaw the bitter end of reflection alone."

CHAPTER XVI.

A YOUNG CYCLONE LET LOOSE.

Bob had been greatly tickled with the quaint methods adopted by this Wolverine marshal for doing his duty, and yet, at the same time assisting the young fellow whose cause his heart told him was just.

It gave him the chance he desired.

To lose sight of Squire Muscroft for any length of time at this stage of the game meant a more severe tangle.

The man had really reached a desperate point, since his plot which had worked so smoothly all these years now threatened to collapse.

So Bob took the back track, heading for the house where he had so recently found a mother.

It struck him as odd that he could not say he be certain of his own name.

True, they called the lady the Widow Muscroft, but at the same time she was the Squire's sister, and unless she had married a cousin of the same name this could not be.

These things gave Bob little uneasiness.

In fact he had no time to worry.

Action was needed in order to carry the day, and Bob was by nature and training well calculated to meet the emergency. Although he found himself pitted against an adversary as cruel and merciless as the Prince of Darkness himself.

Where was Andy?

Why had not the friend whose advice he found so valuable, and whose assistance already served to bring about a meeting with his mother—why had he not followed him when the marshal took him in charge?

Truth to tell, Andy had conceived an idea, and upon leaving the Muscroft house had started on a run for another section.

Squire Muscroft was not alone in his capacity as a legal man—another squire lived half a mile away, and between them a bitterness existed which, in times past and on many occasions been the cause of open warfare that was highly edifying to the people.

Perhaps Squire Archibald would see a chance to get even by admitting Bob to bail.

Bob had in all hardly been gone fifteen minutes when he again discovered the house through the trees.

A light gleamed in a window, though the shades of evening were not beginning to gather, and it would not be dark for more than an hour.

This time Bob was determined.

His whole nature had been aroused and he meant to deal with his rascally uncle regardless of any law in the matter.

That could come later.

The more publicity the case was given the better he would like it.

On his side there was nothing to hide, while Squire Muscroft would soon find himself in the power of a shrewd city lawyer, and tangled up in the net he had spread for others.

So Bob advanced.

He was regretful not being armed, having dropped the marshal's revolver in the bushes, and the rifle he had left with Pete, under the impression that the latter might see trouble from those who were coming in the rival balloon.

That was no reason he could not make a show. Though no Irish blood ran in his veins that he was aware of, Bob had learned during the circus life how to use the quarter staff, so much in vogue in olden times.

He had an eye about him, and discovering an elegant cudgel on the ground picked it up with a view to future use.

Should that same bullet chance to descend upon the head of the Squire with any degree of violence, he must see about it.

Thus armed Bob found himself once more upon the scene of the strange house.

Eagerly he peered in through the window, hardly knowing what to expect, but he finally came to the conclusion that it was the wholly the result of his sharp run from the point where he had left the marshal tied to a tree.

Excitement had a good deal to do with it.

No one was in the room, and through the open window that reached the floor, he entered.

Could the Squire have carried his mother away in such a short time?

Perhaps she was simply shut in her room.

If still in the house Bob meant to find her.

He raced about looking here, there and everywhere, and his appearance was anything but reassuring.

Just as he was about to take hold of a door, it was kicked open from the other side.

A girl entered.

She carried a tray in her hands containing dishes which were possibly meant for an evening meal.

As her gaze suddenly fell upon the figure of Bob, with his wicked club, she gave a shriek.

Smash went the china.

It was a great day for the pottery business.

Regardless of the awful wreck at her feet, the alarmed girl dropped on her knees and with clasped hands besought the supposed robber to spare her life, as she was only a poor orphan.

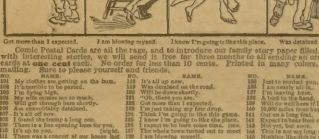
Now Bob was not in that business, but he surely saw it would be useless trying to argue the point with one whose mind was weak.

"It's the Squire I want. Lead me to him, girl," he said, trying to speak as quietly as possible, in order to reassure her.

(Continued on page fifteen.)

Comic Post Cards 1c Each

MORE FUN THAN A BARREL OF MONKEYS.



Got more than I expected. I am blowing myself. I know I'm going to the dickens. Was drinking on the roof.

Comic Postal Cards are all the rage, and to introduce our family story paper filled to the brim with interesting stories, we will send it to you for three months to all sending an order for these cards at one cent each. No order for less than 50 cents. Printed in colors. Ready for mailing. Sure to please yourself and friends.

NO.	NAME.	NO.	NAME.
101	My clothes are getting on the bum.	117	Just to meet you.
102	It's horrible to be patted.	118	Was drinking on the road.
103	Oh, you kid.	119	Was drinking on the roof.
104	My wife knows an escape.	120	"Oh, there you are."
105	Will get through here shortly.	121	Got more than I expected.
106	Am extremely detained.	122	I'm just taking my first drink.
107	It's all of now.	123	Think I'm going to like this game.
108	Will be coming a long one.	124	Am sorry I have no time to spare.
109	There is a big opening here for you.	125	I expect to hit him some time. (Hit)
110	It's up to you. (Hight.	126	The whole town turned out to meet
111	Those are a concert at our house last	127	I am blowing myself.
112	It was an ear-ticling.	128	I am in safe hands, don't worry.
113	Am glad to see you.	129	Am sorry I have no time.
114	My board is paid for.	130	It was high to take home.
115	I am taking my meals outside. (away	131	Just landed here.
116	Will be with you as soon as I can get	132	This was very assembly impressed.
117	The sea has such a fascination for me.	133	I am rapidly disposing of the goods.

Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded. Order by name, no' names. Remember, one cent each, ten for ten cents, thirty for twenty-five cents, or thirty-five cents for the whole set of fifty cards. Silver or stamps. Address

DIGNAM'S MAGAZINE, Department 6364 338 Wabash Avenue, Chicago, Ills.

CAMERA AND PHOTO OUTFIT

FREE FREE

With One Year's Subscription to

THE CHICAGO LEDGER

This is the King Camera. Any person can take excellent pictures with it by following the instructions. You can finish your own pictures with the complete outfit we send with the Camera.

The Printing and Developing Outfit consists of one package "Perfect" Dry Plates, one Tray for developing, one Tray for toning pictures, one package Developer, one package Toning Chemicals, one package Hypo, one Printing Back, one package Sensitized Printing Paper and one package Ruby Paper. Everything you need.

To Secure Camera and Outfit Free send $1.00 for one year's subscription to The Chicago Ledger. You get this fine paper every week for a year for the dollar, and you get the Camera and Outfit absolutely free, if you subscribe now.

(Canadian subscription price $1.50 per year.)

Send to

W. D. BOYCE CO., BOYCE BUILDING, CHICAGO.

Dollar Bottle FREE TRIAL

MAKES STRONG MEN

WRITE TODAY

Vitaline Tablets

Send name and address, and a card accepted until you receive a free sample. Then say with a plot least that you shall be glad to send the right medicine, then a month's treatment for you, costing you only $1.00.

Vitaline Tablets are prepared in the form of Dr. F. Percy Food and Iron Act, serial No. 807, to contain absolutely nothing poisonous or habit-forming or harmful in any way, and are guaranteed to be the most powerful blood, nerve and stomach medicine, an invigorating stimulants of any kind—making of life strong, vibrating, full of vim. You have never had anything like Vitaline Tablets—they are a wonderful tonic and strengthening nerves.

Dr. Bates writes you and all mail is plain sealed. Fill out blank.

Dr. Percy Bates Co., No. 21 Dover Bldg., Chicago.
Send at once by mail in plain package $1.00 bottle of Vitaline Tablets, for which I enclose $1.00 in full payment. If after using one bottle I still need you $1.00.

Name .....

Address .....

Good Luck Emblem.

Send us your name and address and we will send you a Good Luck Emblem. It is a beautiful Gold Finished Horseshoe Pin, with a Guaranteed Stone in the center. Wear it 10 days and if you like it, send us 25 cents. If not, return it and we will refund your money. We are doing this to introduce our goods. Write today. Address

Order at once. 169 Dearborn St., Chicago.

"PERSONAL"

Any lady or gentleman wishing to correspond with the opposite sex for fun, friendship or improvement, should write at once to us. We have hundreds of pictured widows and widowers who want to marry. Many pleasant acquaintances and many friends are secured through us. Every one is strictly confidential. We refer to this paper. Address with stamp for reply and a description of yourself.

Personal Correspondence Club, Chicago, Ill.

BEST If your nerves are untrue, or your blood impure, if you have Kidney Troubles, Indigestion, Dizziness, Sour Stomach, or certain Female Troubles, we are responsible. If you have backache and you wish anywhere that you should be strong, if you are losing energy and ambition, if you are tired out, you need the BEST medicine on earth—the one that you will be satisfied with after the first dose—the one that cured over 600,000 in the past year.

Beck's Wonder-Worker Tablets

Sold at only $1. Send no Scent stamp for report of false positive and C. O. D. scheme. Don't be deceived. proof that my Wonder-Worker are the greatest vitalizing force on earth.

GEO. B. BECK, 144 Main St., Springfield, O.

MEN AND WOMEN

CURE YOURSELF!

Big 4# is a nonpoisonous injection for Gonorrhea, Gleet, Spermatorrhea, Whites, unnatural discharges, or any inflammation, irritation or ulceration of mucous membranes. Non-astringent. Sold by DRUGGISTS or sent in plain wrapper, by express, prepaid, for $1.00, or 3 bottles, $2.75. Circular sent on request.

BLOOD POISON

FOR MORE THAN TWENTY YEARS

We have made the cure of blood poison a specialty. Primary, Secondary or Tertiary Blood Poison Permanently Cured. You can safely be treated at home under same guaranty. Capital $500,000. We solicit the most obstinate cases. If you have exhausted the old remedies at Hot Springs and still have aches and pains, Mucus Patches in Mouth, Sore Throat, Pimples, Copper-Colored Spots, Ulcers on any part of the body, Hair or Eyebrows falling out, it is the blood we cure. 100 page book, free. Describes your case and we will advise you. Address

COOK REMEDY CO,
1730 MASONIC TEMPLE, Chicago, U. S. A.

Free Sample COPY

of COMMERCIAL POULTRY, a journal devoted to the culture of poultry, issued monthly. Every number contains valuable information for poultrymen. Its articles are prepared by men who have made a success of raising poultry. They tell the reader, in these articles, how to produce the best results with the smallest expenditure. Don't take our word for this. Send for a sample copy and see for yourself.

Write to

COMMERCIAL POULTRY CO.
Dept. 23, Marseilles, Ill.

When answering advertisements you will favor the advertiser and the publishers by mentioning The Chicago Ledger.

DOOMED TO BE A BACHELOR.

I'm doomed to be a bachelor,
Thro' all my lonely days
All ways I've tried to win a lass—
Alas, I've failed always.

To Mabel in a hammock one
Quite lonely day I came,
Until the spell was broken, when
The hammock gosling broke.

And once, when darling Winifred
Was nearly won, alack!
I meant to fall upon my knees,
But fell upon a tack.

And Ethnor I nearly kissed,
But, in forgetfulness, used
My lit cigar, and after that
At her house came no sight.

And hunting once with Genevieve
I slipped my arm about
Her waist—but then we both fell in
And then, of course, fell out.

So I must be a bachelor
Thro' all my lonely days:
All ways I've tried to win a lass—
Alas, I've failed always.

The Young Wife's Fatal Mistake.

"You may retire now, Justine," said Monsieur De Pardaillan to the woman bustling about his comtesse; "madam will remove her attire alone."

They had just come in from the ball, one of the most brilliant assemblies of the great world becoming, at this epoch, rarer and rarer. The month of September, 1884, had seen Paris half-deposed from its throne, following the example of the strangers at the first bulletin of cholera.

All the same, the ball had been given, and they had danced, laughed and joked, not without spirit, in the Rue de Varenne, at the house of the Dowager Duchess De Pardaillan, the worst's grandmother, a lady of eighty years, who was accustomed to celebrate the anniversary of her birthday there and unwilling to put off this fete till the following year.

Madam would remove her toilet alone. No wonder that Justine, the pretty little waiting-maid of the Comtesse De Pardaillan, brusquely dismissed by the comte, mounted to her chamber three o'clock in the morning all bewildered by a preference so foreign to the habits of her employers.

Alone together, the husband and wife regarded each other. Between them was a clear intuition that possesses all women in front of threatening danger; the comte, asking himself in what form it would be, began the conversation. It was the comtesse that loudly broke the silence.

"I am naturally much interested, my dear Henri," she said, "in the jealousy you have to say, and trust that you will not make me wait longer the word of the enigma——"

Monsieur De Pardaillan stopped her by drawing from his pocket a letter, which he presented to her silently.

It was an anonymous note.

The comtesse turned white as she ran her eyes over the lines that told her of the treason to the most loyal of men, but, regarding it a second time, she saw in the missive insinuation than a formal denunciation, and, all at once, the name of the lover that they said she had was not given.

"Bah, an anonymous letter," cried she disdainfully, attempting to her husband. "When did you receive it?"

"Three days ago."

"Three days! And it is only this evening, on returning from the ball, that you speak of it to your wife. Why, you say!"

Why, you say! Because the heart of man is so made that, whatever be his habitual sentiments—doubt—that gnaws and kills! Because, in him, irritation or silence is action of mucous membranes. Non-astringent. Sold by DRUGGISTS or sent in plain wrapper, by express, prepaid, for $2.00, or 3 bottles, $5.00. Circular sent on request.

Because, in him, irritation or silence is the first vital symptom, the organs of his temperament, sensual, sanguine, bilious, nervous, blood, heart, by which means they cure and suppress all symptoms of disease, to impress the elements of any kind—feeding of life strong, vibrating, full of vim. You have never had anything like Vitaline Tablets—they are a wonderful tonic and strengthening nerves.

Dr. Bates writes you and all mail is plain sealed. Fill out blank.

Dr. Percy Bates Co., No. 21 Dover Bldg., Chicago.
Send at once by mail in plain package $1.00 bottle of Vitaline Tablets, for which I enclose $1.00 in full payment. If after using one bottle I still need you $1.00.

Name .....

Address .....

Good Luck Emblem.

Send us your name and address and we will send you a Good Luck Emblem. It is a beautiful Gold Finished Horseshoe Pin, with a Guaranteed Stone in the center. Wear it 10 days and if you like it, send us 25 cents. If not, return it and we will refund your money. We are doing this to introduce our goods. Write today. Address

Order at once. 169 Dearborn St., Chicago.

"PERSONAL"

Any lady or gentleman wishing to correspond with the opposite sex for fun, friendship or improvement, should write at once to us. We have hundreds of pictured widows and widowers who want to marry. Many pleasant acquaintances and many friends are secured through us. Every one is strictly confidential. We refer to this paper. Address with stamp for reply and a description of yourself.

Personal Correspondence Club, Chicago, Ill.

BEST If your nerves are untrue, or your blood impure, if you have Kidney Troubles, Indigestion, Dizziness, Sour Stomach, or certain Female Troubles, we are responsible. If you have backache and you wish anywhere that you should be strong, if you are losing energy and ambition, if you are tired out, you need the BEST medicine on earth—the one that you will be satisfied with after the first dose—the one that cured over 600,000 in the past year.

Beck's Wonder-Worker Tablets

Sold at only $1. Send no Scent stamp for report of false positive and C. O. D. scheme. Don't be deceived. proof that my Wonder-Worker are the greatest vitalizing force on earth.

GEO. B. BECK, 144 Main St., Springfield, O.

MEN AND WOMEN

CURE YOURSELF!

Big 4# is a nonpoisonous injection for Gonorrhea, Gleet, Spermatorrhea, Whites, unnatural discharges, or any inflammation, irritation or ulceration of mucous membranes. Non-astringent. Sold by DRUGGISTS or sent in plain wrapper, by express, prepaid, for $2.00, or 3 bottles, $5.00. Circular sent on request.

BLOOD POISON

FOR MORE THAN TWENTY YEARS

We have made the cure of blood poison a specialty. Primary, Secondary or Tertiary Blood Poison Permanently Cured. You can safely be treated at home under same guaranty. Capital $500,000. We solicit the most obstinate cases. If you have exhausted the old remedies at Hot Springs and still have aches and pains, Mucus Patches in Mouth, Sore Throat, Pimples, Copper-Colored Spots, Ulcers on any part of the body, Hair or Eyebrows falling out, it is the blood we cure. 100 page book, free. Describes your case and we will advise you. Address of COMMERCIAL POULTRY, a journal devoted to the culture of poultry, issued monthly. Every number contains valuable information for poultrymen. Its articles are prepared by men who have made a success of raising poultry. They tell the reader, in these articles, how to produce the best results with the smallest expenditure. Don't take our word for this. Send for a sample copy and see for yourself.

COOK REMEDY CO,
1730 MASONIC TEMPLE, Chicago, U. S. A.

Free Sample COPY

Write to

COMMERCIAL POULTRY CO.
Dept. 23, Marseilles, Ill.

When answering advertisements you will favor the advertiser and the publishers by mentioning The Chicago Ledger.

Keys hung on a gold ring, a tiny flask of smelling-salts, and a small sheet of paper folded in four and a little crumpled, which she handed to her husband with the same serenity as the other objects.

The comte seized it eagerly, believing it a love-letter. The sheet of paper was absolutely blank.

"And bald!" said the young woman sadly, "what has forever disturbed the peace of our household—the innocent scrap of paper that I had put into my bouquet on going to your mother's house to make me remember to you the name of the woman who darns her laces so marvelously?"

The Comte De Pardillan could only cry over and over again:

"Ah, my dear, dear wife! Shall you ever be able to forgive me?"

Octavie hesitated a moment. Pardon immediately accorded would have detracted from her husband an outburst of gratitude and joy that she would have all to satisfy.

"You ask me to pardon you, Henri? Like this, immediately after such an outrageous suspicion? Ah, no! it would be impossible! No; leave me at least time to persuade myself that you seriously admit of extenuating circumstances. Tomorrow, Henri, tomorrow; not today."

Her voice had lost the energy of a while ago, and her adieu had the gentleness of a prayer. Conquered, nervous but with a ray of hope in his heart, Henri De Pardaillan left the chamber of his wife like a repentant and obedient child.

Octavie made but one leap to the door to turn the bolt. She was home at last!

The danger that she had just escaped, the terrible struggle, the audacity, the world with its pitiless rigor—all was forgotten. Her heart, like all the fibers of her body, were thrilling and singing the beloved name of her lover—Robert! Robert! Robert!

She no longer thought of the fatal sheet of paper that had fallen under the table, overlooked in the hurry, and then, kneeling before the fireplace, she exposed it for a moment to the heat of the flame. And then, oh, miracle! the sheet of paper, white became little by little of a bluish color, and at last there appeared, with luminous, almost phosphorescent, characters:

* * *

It was three months now since Octavie De Pardaillan had given her love to Robert Dermont, and their mutual love can be told in few words—a lightning stroke for both of them. From the first glances exchanged there had been no need of explanations made for each other in this world and in the other.

Robert, for a young worldling, realized a type bordering upon the extraordinary. Rich, elegant, handsome, and of noble family, he had scarcely finished his medical studies when he had obtained and solicited the favor of taking part in a scientific mission, whose object was to travel through the East seeking the solution of that frightful problem, the source of the many deadly epidemics that ravage India. For several years the young man, sustained by an ardent love of studies and nature, would be marked each of his days with some valuable discovery.

Returning to Paris already celebrated, Octavie De Pardillan (that beautiful woman lends to the name a sonorous charm), and he had met at a mutual friend's house, and, notwithstanding all of the enormity of the fall, the die for them was cast.

Even the rarity of their interviews but still more increased the violence of their passion. Octavie had at least the comfort of knowing her lover near her, in which she poured out all her soul; but he, prudent and jealous for the honor of the woman he loved, he would not expose her reputation to leave nothing to chance—his letters might be intercepted, his handwriting betray the reason, to a scientific process by which the police had he wrote could be read by Octavie alone. And over it was the means of deciphering their language, the way to communicate to speak. But she must not always, he had told her, always, without fail have the note as soon as read. The ink in which his pen was charged was a deadly poison, frightful in the rapidity of its work. Ten drops from her lips, the slightest of a wound, and nothing could save her.

* * *

Octavie feverishly tore open the page.

"I shall be free tomorrow, my beloved," wrote Robert; "tomorrow I shall await you at the accustomed hour. What things I have to say to you! What days I shall press on your heart! Ah, my dearest, how happy to be loved thus by you! I often ask myself if I am not the victim of a dream!"

"The victim of a dream? Oh, no, not that, Robert; him I do, with all my heart and soul," murmured the young woman dreamily, her lids half-closed, a half-smile on her lips, the handsome biography countenance of her lover, as she threw him that parting nod to the ballroom, rising anew like a vision before her eyes.

Just at this moment two little taps sounded softly on the door. She sprang to her feet, trembling violently. Who was it knocked thus at such an hour? Her husband—her husband, of course! She called almost, distractedly:

"I'm in bed; I've pushed to the bolt."

The door, nevertheless, opened. Henri De Pardaillan entered.

"The bolt," said he; "you thought you pushed it. Nevertheless—the door was open."

With a movement quick as thought Octavie had crumpled the accusing letter in her hand, concealing her hand.

"What do you wish?" demanded she, "—ckless of the rudeness of her words.

"I was uneasy——"

"Uneasy!"

"Yes, that scratch you gave yourself a while ago, through my fault, and that was bleeding still when I went out."

"That scratch? Yes, yes; I remember. A mere trifle; it is nearly well," said she coldly, and concealing her hand behind her. Then, in a voice become suddenly hoarse and nearly unintelligible, she added:

"Well, you can leave me now, since, as you see, it is nothing—nothing at all but——"

Madam De Pardillan did not finish her sentence, but suddenly fell forward like a log on the carpet.

The comte sprang toward her.

"Octavie! Octavie!"

She lay inert, speechless, and pallid.

* * *

In less than a minute all the house was in commotion, running bewildered from side to side.

"A doctor! a doctor!" cried Monsieur De Pardaillan, mad with sorrow and fright.

No one, as is usually the case in such emergencies, seemed to know where to find a doctor in that immediate neighborhood till Monsieur De Pardaillan's valet bethought himself of Robert Dourtemont.

And while Octavie's female attendants cut strings and laces, and placed their mistress in bed, the comte hurriedly paced the floor.

"Robert, Robert!" he cried; "why didn't I think of him sooner? He will come; he will dare what no other doctor will dare. He has travelled, studied, brought back precious remedies that he alone knows, and then—he is my friend; he will save her, Octavie——"

The door opened behind him, and Robert Dourtemont stood on the sill, paler even than the husband himself, who rushed to meet him and dragged him to the bedside, where Octavie still lay rigid and pallid.

"All is over, monsieur, I fear," murmured compassionately the voice of Justine, chafing the comtesse's hands; "the heart no longer beats."

All over? Octavie dead? Robert Dourtemont refused to believe his senses.

"No, no," he cried, "no! Quick, go, bring salts—ether—ammonia; a shock may revive her."

The comte and the waiting-women sprang to obey. Robert remained alone beside the great columned bed with its waving plumes, like a towering catafalque, dazed, making himself ask if he were not all a hideous dream, from which he could presently awake.

"Octavie," he murmured, bending close to the pale lips, "Octavie, speak to me! Tell me that you are not dead!"

And he seized her hand with the ardent faith of one who knows of the power of love to work miracles.

Suddenly he started, and bent still closer. That little hand that he held in his own—that hand clenched so tight that the nails left a red mark in its tender flesh—was clasped upon a strip of bluish paper.

He forced them open gently, and—his own letter lay before him, stained with two little purple drops that had oozed, apparently, from a scratch on the lover's palm. It was a revelation to Robert, swift as the flash that precedes the thunderbolt. Octavie was dead of poison, and it was he who had killed her!

Henri De Pardaillan returned at that moment, bearing the prescribed remedies.

"It is useless—useless, Henri," Robert stammered out. "All is over. She—she is dead!"

"Dead? Octavie dead? Oh, Heaven! Dead of what? Without warning—without a moment's illness?" said the comte despairingly.

Robert had an inspiration. The honor of the dead—it must remain unspotted. Above all else, he must cut short investigation, and prevent all prying into this cruel business.

"Yes," said he, without hesitation, and loud enough for all to hear him, "dead, Henri, of—cholera!"

And the comte clutched husband sought to throw himself upon the bed beside his wife. Robert kindly but firmly held him back, reverently drew the sheet over the face of his dead love, and led him from the chamber.

"On reflection," he said to him, "but your wife must be buried, and all that belonged to the deceased be burned. It is the physician who speaks now, Henri, or, rather, I should say, the physician who orders."

And all the papers and letters were filled with the following touching description of the funeral:

"The latest victim of the terrible scourge," as one of the journalists called it, was being away in a moment, like a withered flower, bearing still on her marble brow the triple seals of youth, beauty, and fascinating virtue."

Death runs the world away, and no one the wiser.

Every Lady Read This.

Years ago when I was a sufferer, an old nurse told me of a wonderful cure for Leucorrhœa, Displacements, Painful Periods, Uterine and Ovarian Troubles. It cured me in one month. It is a simple, harmless lotion that can be prepared by any one at home for a trifle. I will send, in true Christian suffering sister who writes to me. Address Mrs. A. Hoskins' South Bend, Indiana.

Gladys—I think the night Bob proposed he had too much champagne and I had to do just as he wished me to do.

Grace—Oh! then you refused him, did you?

The Balloon Boys.

(Continued from page thirteen.)

"I can't—I don't know where he is," she replied, still wringing her hands in that ridiculous fashion.

"I have come for my mother, Mrs. Muscroft. Lead me to her room, and no harm will fall upon you. Do you hear—I am in a hurry."

"Oh! yes, sir. Please follow me. Your mother—poor dear lady, I'm glad some one has come at last."

The girl began to recover when she found she was not to be injured.

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"For years she has been looking forward to some one coming. And you are her son?"

Bob did not make answer, as he was not in the humor for a conversation.

They had meanwhile ascended a flight of stairs, meeting no one on the way.

"This is the room," indicating a door.

"You mean the widow's?"

"Yes, sir," trembling again as she saw his eyes fastened upon her, for Bob when aroused was really a spectacle to appal a timid female, especially after she had received such a shock as followed her sudden meeting at the door, and the awful crash of broken china.

Bob looked down.

The key was in the lock, and this would indicate that possibly the lady was fastened in.

He knocked.

There came no answer.

Then he turned the knob of the door, and threw the latter wide open.

If he expected to see Mrs. Muscroft seated there he was doomed to disappointment.

The room was finely furnished, which was one thing at least in Squire's favor, but occupant it had none.

Bob had entered in his eagerness.

Just then he heard the sound of wheels grating on the gravel outside.

Filled with a sudden idea that the Squire was taking his sister to some other retreat where it would be doubly difficult to find her, Bob sprang to one of the small windows, which were half covered with vines.

As he bent down to look out he heard the door slam, and the key turn in the lock.

The girl in her alarm had seized upon this chance to make him a prisoner.

This extremely interesting story of youthful adventures in ballooning will be continued in next week's Ledger. This story is filled with excitement and dangerous situations, and if you do not read it to the end you will miss a great deal that is splendidly entertaining. Would you like our fine King Cameras without cost, or six of our fine spring patterns entirely free? If our fine spring patterns entirely free? Then subscribe for the Ledger and they will be sent to you. Read our premium announcement on pages thirteen and fifteen.

MRS. WHOOPER'S AFFLICTION.

BY MAX ADELER.

Mr. Whooper came into Judge Perkins' office the other day, and, after drawing a chair close to the Judge, he took a seat, put his hat on the table, wiped his nose thoughtfully, and said:

"I say, Judge, what do you charge a man for getting him a divorce?"

"A divorce, Mr. Whooper? You are not thinking of that, I hope?"

"Well, yes, I was," said Mr. Whooper, with a mournful air.

"Quarreled with your wife?"

"Not exactly—but—well, I reckon I might as well explain the matter to you. You see, I love Pandora well enough. I think a good deal of her; but, blame it, Judge, I can't stand her ridiculous ways!"

"How do you mean?"

"Why, you see, she's a somnambulist—has a habit of walking in her sleep. She'll get up at night, any time almost, and go fumbling around the house in the most reckless manner. When she gets tired she'll turn in anywhere, and roost until morning. I've found her twice sitting on top of the flour barrel, sleeping sweet as a baby; three times I've waked her up in the coal-bin, and once, when she had the nightmare, I found her hanging across the back fence—said she dreamed she was a pillow-case and that she'd been hung there after the wash to dry. I tell you, it tears a man's feelings up like fireworks!"

"You ought to bear it with greater resignation."

"Well, I have tried to; but I can't. About a month ago, while she was meandering around in the dining-room, she kicked over a table and made a terrific noise. Nearly scared me to death, I thought there were burglars in the house, and so I blew my lantern-chimney out of the window, and fired my revolver twice down into the hallway. When the policemen came I let 'em in, and we began a search, with pistols in our hands. Upon entering the dining-room we found Mrs. Whooper sitting there, holding an umbrella on her left arm, as if it was a baby, while she was trying to feed it with the vinegar cruet. Fast asleep, of course! I'm ashamed to meet the neighbors on the street now; I can hear 'em snicker as I go past."

"No doubt Mrs. Whooper was sorry?"

"Oh, of course, sorry! Apologized, and all that! Said she'd never do it again. But only two nights later she had a vision or something which moved her to rise, pick up my vest and shirt, the chain and pin all out and bury 'em in the asparagus bed. When she came back I was awake. She had the revolver over her shoulder, and I watched her through my cocks and false teeth and start down the stairs again. I jumped out of bed and caught her. I shook her until she woke, and then she tried to beg off by explaining that she dreamed she had discovered a wolf raising vests and artificial teeth on trees, so that she could pick 'em for me when they were ripe. That woman has the loonicest old dreams that ever rattled around in a female brain-pan."

"It is merely her misfortune."

"That's true! That's so! I pity her; but what's a man to do? You know the headboard on our bedstead? No? Well, it's about nine feet high. Last Thursday week I was waked in the night by a strange noise. I missed Pandora, but, looking around, I found her perched on top of the headboard with an open umbrella in one hand and a handbox in the other. She had on a nightdress and a sunbonnet, and when I asked her what on earth she was about she told me to 'give some oats to the off horse.' Then she kicked the headboard with her heels, uttered a wild cahoot, and the next minute she plunged head downward upon the bed, broke three slats, and brought her aunt downstairs from the third story, four steps at a jump, under the impression that there had been an earthquake. When she came to she said she'd been reading in the papers about the four-in-hand coaches, and somehow she got to dreaming she was driving one for a bet. Now, I tell you, it's pretty hard for a man to stand that kind of thing, isn't it?"

"Yes, of course."

"But I would have stood it if she hadn't carried it a little too far. She asked me a few days ago to let her tie a string to her ankle and to mine, so when she got up in her sleep she would wake me. I agreed. She said string, mind you, but when she came to do the tying she used the whole kind of twine! Anyhow, all went well until last night, when Pandora, while asleep, became impressed with the idea that she was crossing the Alps, or swimming the Atlantic Ocean, or something, for she rose and went over to the staircase. Just as she reached the top landing her foot must have caught in the carpet, for she shot down the stairs head foremost, like a stone out of a catapult, and, of course, as I was tied to her, I suddenly went booming out of bed, and the first thing I knew I was lying on the floor, feeling a little uncertain whether a volcano had all at once developed under the bed, or whether a barrel of gunpowder had exploded in the cellar. Then I felt Pandora pulling at the other end of the rope, and I comprehended the situation.

"When I picked her up she said she wasn't hurt much, and I've no doubt she'll spend tonight sliding up and down the waterspout on the outside of the house; only she'll have to go it alone. This lets her out. I'm going to get a divorce. How much will it cost?"

The Judge promised to give him the information next day, but he didn't call, and the supposition is that he was persuaded to give Pandora one more chance. But there is going to be a painful domestic tragedy at Whooper's some day unless Mrs. W. learns to stick to her pillow.

Pat's Reasoning.

An Englishman and an Irishman were walking along a country road when they crept into a farmyard and stole a horse from the stable. Pat, thinking that the horse was no good without the cart, stole a cart from the same place. The news soon spread about that farmer Olive had had a horse and cart stolen, and the police were soon on their track. The policeman, meeting the Englishman with the horse, inquired of him where he got the horse, the Englishman replying that the animal belonged to him.

"How can you prove it?" asked the policeman.

"Because I have had it since it was a foal," was the answer.

Pat overheard the conversation. He was pulling the cart along when the policeman stopped him, asking him if the cart belonged to him.

"Sure," said Pat; "why, I have have this cart ever since it was a wheelbarrow."

FREE---6 STYLISH PATTERNS---FREE

We will send any six of these fashionable, up-to-date patterns ABSOLUTELY FREE with one year's subscription to THE CHICAGO LEDGER. These patterns are from the latest Paris designs. They are best for the home dressmaker, being simple and economical.

One year's subscription to the LEDGER costs only one dollar. You get this fine family story paper every week for a year for the dollar, and you get six of these elegant patterns FREE, by subscribing now.

Select any six patterns—send the number and size of each, with one dollar to Subscription for Canada $1.50 per year.

PATTERN DEPT., CHICAGO LEDGER, CHICAGO, ILL.

5622 SEVEN GORED SKIRT 24 TO 36 WAIST
5627 BOY'S OVERALLS 4 TO 8 YEARS
5619 FIVE GORED PETTICOAT 22 TO 32 WAIST
5675 MISSES' CHESTERFIELD COAT 12 AND 16 YEARS
5651 GIRLS JUMPER DRESS WITH GUIMPE 4 TO 10 YEARS
5626 CHILDS DRESS 2, 4 AND 6 YEARS
5617 FIVE GORED SKIRT 22 TO 30 WAIST
5665 OVER BLOUSE WITH GIRDLE 32 TO 40 BUST
5632 BOYS BLOUSE SUIT 6 TO 12 YEARS
5613 BLOUSE OR SHIRT WAIST 32 TO 44 BUST
5606 GIRLS DRESS 6 TO 12 YEARS
5493 FITTED JACHET 36 TO 46 BUST
5620 SHIRT WAIST OR BLOUSE 32 TO 42 BUST
5612 BOYS BLOUSE 4 TO 12 YEARS
5677 OVER BLOUSE OR JUMPER 32 TO 42 BUST
5639 FANCY VOKE BLOUSE 32 TO 42 BUST
5643 PRINCESSE JUMPER GOWN 32 TO 40 BUST
5641 CORSET COVER 34 TO 44 BUST
5648 GIRLS COAT 4 TO 12 YEARS
5678 CAPE ETON 34 TO 42 BUST
5642 TUCKED FLOUNCE SKIRT 22 TO 30 WAIST
5657 GIRLS DRESS 8 TO 14 YEARS
5624 ONE-PIECE KIMONO SMALL, MEDIUM LARGE
5676 NINE GORED PLAITED SKIRT 22 TO 30 WAIST

MAGIC BASE BALL CURVER

Curve pitching is made easy by its use. A child can do it. Send 10 cts. for it and a book of baseball secrets by the inventor as fast as they come in last. The factory cannot run fast enough to supply them. AWFUL curves come from it. Box sent, postpaid, for 10 cts. Or three boxes for 25 cts. Circulars free.

SPECIAL OFFER.—Send 25 cents and we will send the "Magic" Curver, also a large fat book on "OUTDOOR SPORTS," containing 100 large cuts for baseball, shooting, lawn tennis, sailing, etc., etc., and instructions how to hold the ball for pitching ALL the different curves. Chapters on batting, fielding, base running, etc. Don't wait, be first in your town to have one. Send a silver quarter to-day, and we will send you the Curver and book by return mail.

STAR MFG. CO., 49 State Str., Lowville, N. Y.

TAPE-WORM EXPELLED WITH HEAD, GUARANTEED. NO STARVING. Pamphlet free. DR. BELL & CO., 1164 Race St., Cincinnati, O.

DETECTIVES Shrewd, reliable man wanted in every county, to act under instructions. Salary or commission. Write at once. Address W. C. Webster, Indianapolis, Ind.

PATENTS. Send for Inventor's Primer. Book, How to Obtain & Sell Patents, FREE. No fee in St. Washington, D.C. Established 1856. Branches: Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit

LADIES—Free introductory Sample of Beauty Cream and also copy of Beauty Book; for only three 2-cent stamps to cover cost of mailing. Address The Marston Co., Station A, Boston, Mass.

OPIUM or Morphine Habit cured. Free trial treatment. We specially treat cases where other remedies failed. Confidential. HARRIS INSTITUTE Room 338, No. 100 W. 23d St. NEW YORK

A SONG IS OFTEN WORTH A FORTUNE to the author. Send us your poem or music to sold for a song. Send us your poem or music and we will secure a copyright and have it published and sold for you on royalty. Send us your latest song for FREE. COLONIAL MUSIC CO., 815-817 E. 63d St., Chicago

ASTHMA Send for free sample of our Asthma Tar. Harmless but effectual. Immediate relief guaranteed. Asthma Tape Co., 92 E. High St., Detroit, Mich.

VENTRILOQUISM

Learned by any Man or Boy at Home. Small cost. Send 10day's stamp in the for particulars and proof. O. A. SMITH, ROOM 100—1060 BROADWAY AVE., TOLEDO, O.

X-RAY CATHODOSCOPE Latest pocket outfit. Only 5 cts. Everybody wants it. Tells time or shows through cloth apparel. To see your fellow, lass girl, or any one, see through clothing, wood or stone any distance; all ages; lasts lifetime; always ready for use. Prepaid by mail, 5 cts. each, dozen by express, $1.00. Address THE A. HOLLY CO., Box 2888, N. Y.

Teddy Bear 12 inches high, with full fur effect. Handsomely dressed in the latest fashion. Will be sent to any boy or girl who will send us 12 subscribers to our paper at 25 cts. each. Address THE JUNIOR AMERICAN, 611 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

CORNS WHAT A RELIEF when first applied. Quick! CERTAIN! PLEASANT! Acts like magic. Soon removes permanently, safely and without pain. No caustic. No trouble. To try it is to use it. Sent prepaid on receipt of 25 cents. Circulars free. DAISY CHEMICAL CO., Philadelphia.

MEN WANTED in every locality throughout the United States with rig or capable of handling horses, to advertise our goods, tacking up show cards in all conspicuous places, distributing small advertising matter. Commission or salary $75 a month and expenses $2.50 a day. Steady employment to good reliable men. We pay our own men. Horses and rig furnished when needed. Write for terms. STARK BROTHERS NURSERY, Louisiana, Missouri

A GREAT BARGAIN

This Camera and 100 feet of film for $5.00. Takes pictures 2½ inches square; comes complete with one Kodoscope Tube; post pictures; you pay no more for another outfit. Write for free catalogue of Kodoscopes and Films. Large for those you are tired of buying. Write us once for full particulars and Chicago Film Exchange, 124 Dearborn St., Chicago

Address CAM. D. FARGO, FRENCHTOWN, N. Y.

EXCHANGE YOUR OLD RECORDS FOR NEW

We will give you 10 cents on 100 records, the latest and most popular vaudeville selections. Send 10 cents for those you are tired of hearing. Write at once for full particulars and Chicago Record Exchange, 124 Dearborn St., Chicago

NATIONAL RECORD EXCHANGE, 124 Dearborn St., Chicago

WETO GRAPH

The Great Secret Writing System

FOR LOVERS AND OTHERS

Every lover and every one who writes letters should have a Weto Graph. It is a system of secret writing for correspondence, etc. If you have a Weto Graph you can write letters to your friends and no one but the one to whom you send it can read them. You can also write to your friends on a postal and no one can find out what you have written. Price of the Weto Graph, 25cts. each. Send 25 cents and we will send the Weto Graph by return mail with full instructions. Address PENN PUBLISHING CO., PARNASSUS, PA.

ELGIN, WALTHAM OR HOWARD

Our Premium Watches. Warranted to run and keep correct time for 20 years. Your choice of ELGIN, WALTHAM or HOWARD movement, size or style of case. Solid Gold Filled Case, guaranteed for 20 years. Solid Gold Engraved Case, guaranteed for 25 years. Solid Gold Hunting Case, guaranteed for 25 years. Solid Gold Hunting Case, guaranteed for 25 years. Solid Gold Hunting